Mr. FITZGERALD. That obviates that jealousy. The President is also given the authority, whenever the necessities of the service requires, to change the headquarters of the district from one city or place to another within the district. The result is that Congress having determined the number of districts and the number of ports of entry, it leaves to the executive officials the determination of what the district shall be and where the headquarters shall be, so that the public service may be administered in the interest of the public and not in the interest of any particular locality.

Mr. MURDOCK. While the gentleman is on this subject, I would like to ask him another question: A number of years ago we failed to pass through the House a bill diminishing the number of ports. An investigation had revealed that there were a great number of ports where the collections were practically nil and the salary of the official was many times the amount collected. What was the final outcome of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the first regular session of the last Congress a provision was incorporated in the sundry civil bill authorizing the President to reorganize the districts, to rearrange them, and to abolish useless offices; and that was done by Executive order just before President Taft left office. In the closing days of the administration, in the hurry of doing some of the things that were done, it turned out that some things were done that perhaps ought to be modified.

Under that provision it has been held that the power was exhausted when once exercised. This provision does not permit any increase in the number of districts or ports of entry, but places in the Executive the same power it has relative to the internal-revenue districts; that is, the power to rearrange districts or to place the headquarters where best for the public interest, and to eliminate the jealousies that grow up out of this situation by abolishing the names of districts and to have them known by numbers.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can it be truthfully stated hereafter that virtually all of these small and unnecessary ports have been eliminated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is true. The statement was made before the Committee on Appropriations at this session of Congress that during the current fiscal year the customs service will be conducted for $10,150,000, which will be a saving of between $700,000 and $1,000,000 a year. Not only is there a saving but the customs officials contend that the efficiency of the service is very greatly improved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This matter has occurred to me since I saw the original suggestion. This amendment provides—

That, hereafter, the collector of customs of each customs-collection district shall be officially designated by the number of the district for which he is appointed and not by the name of the port where the headquarters are situated.

Does the gentleman know whether that would require a new commission to be issued?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should think not, because we merely give it the designation of a number. For instance, the collector of the port of New York has been commissioned as collector of the port of New York, and we provide that hereafter the collection district known as the collection district of New York shall be known by a certain number.

Mr. MANN. He is appointed as collector of the New York district by the name of New York, as I understand, and signs communications in that way. That is the personal official designation. Where we change the designation, is the gentleman sure whether it would not require a new commission to be issued, where there is no exception to it provided in the law? When we changed the names of certain solicitors recently, I think the bill carried a provision that it should not require a new appointment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe that it would require a new appointment or commission. If it did it might have the advantage of curtailing the term of a number of hold-over Republicans.

Mr. MANN. It might not have that advantage, because it might result, if they had to be reappointed, in naming a lot of Republicans who would hold four years more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope no such misfortune will be visited upon us as the result of this legislation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman hopes that there will be no such misfortune. We hope that no such misfortune will be visited on the country for a good many years as resulted from the last election.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will discuss that two years from now.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; we will discuss that in November.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will meet that issue without fear or worry.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from New York spoke of a large saving of expense in the collection of customs duties. The gentleman does not mean to say that that comes from the provision in this bill, but that it was on account of previous legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On account of previous legislation. But the gentleman from New York need not take any credit for that, because I believe that I originated it in a Democratic House.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say for the benefit of the gentleman from New York and other gentlemen that I commenced the agitation of that years before he thought of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know; and I recollect that my colleague as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means labored industriously to have a Republican House pass such a bill, but he could not even get it considered in a Republican House, and it remained for a Democratic House to pass this salutary reform legislation.

Mr. PAYNE. That is partially true and partially otherwise. The Democrats were generally standing solid for their ports, and I am sorry to say that some Republicans were. I went at it in a straightforward fashion, but the gentleman from New York took advantage of the information I had given in several prior Congresses and was able to slip in this amendment in an appropriation bill, for which I commend him. It went through, because gentlemen interested in the ports knew nothing about it. I do not know whether the gentleman slipped it in or whether it went in in the Senate. This provision is to get rid of a little friction and jealousy located in the State of Florida between one or more Senators and some Representatives as to the location of the principal port—whether it should be at Tampa or at Jacksonville. Now, if it is left in the hands of the President, it can be used to advantage all around. Gentlemen have agreed to that in the interest of harmony and peace in the State of Florida, but I am not much interested whether there is harmony and peace there or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York deplored the fact on several occasions when he tried to get the bill up that some Democrats apparently went wrong. Well, that unfortunate accident happens occasionally; and the gentleman states what is a notorious fact, that however few Democrats may lapse in virtue it is always certain that there are enough Republicans ready to join them to veto a meritorious proposition. If it had not been that we had the House, we would not have had this legislation.

Mr. PAYNE. I remember that Democrats came to me and said that they would have to stand by So-and-so's port, and I regret to say that Republicans came to me and said the same thing. There was not so much politics in that; it was a standing by each other in the interest of keeping useless offices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is the legislation was meritorious and was not political. If at the time it was enacted it had occurred to Members, I think they would have provided that after the districts had been established and the number had been fixed the same authority would have been given the Executive as is here provided; that is, to readjust and rearrange the districts as the interest of the public service may require. It may be at one time a district will be established because there is great necessity for it, and yet a change in business or trade conditions may eliminate the necessity for the district and make it necessary that a collector at a particular point should be at some other point. It is proper that the administrators of the law, the officials in charge of it, should have that authority.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman recognizes the fact that this thing was recommended by a Republican Executive through several terms, and I was trying all the time to get the legislation, but found difficulty; sometimes I could not get a vote for consideration in the House—the gentleman from Kansas will recollect something about that. Finally it was got through in an appropriation bill, because these watchdogs of public office did not get on to it and know that it was to be done. That was in a Democratic House, and was agreed to by a Republican Senate, and approved by President Taft. The Taft administration took advantage of that and made a readjustment, and it is only to straighten out the difficulty in Florida and some other State that this amendment is now made, and not for the general good of the service, but to take care of the jealousy and friction in those States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Even that would be a meritorious reason.

Mr. PAYNE. Unfortunately it does not apply to the gentleman's own State.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I did not happen to be in the Chamber at the time the gentleman from New York gave his explanation of the meaning of this provision. This is not to create a new district?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. GARNER. It does not authorize the creation of new districts, but simply gives the President the right to readjust the present districts. Does that apply throughout the entire country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Throughout the entire country.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, the President could amalgamate two districts that now exist and create another district simply to enable him to more conveniently and economically collect the customs of the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it is the same authority that he has at present with reference to the internal revenues.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in response to the intimation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I doubt if the conferees on the part of the House had in mind the settling or the removal of any ground for jealousy that might exist in the State of Florida.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They did not.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I fancy the purpose there was to permit the President, so far as Florida is concerned, to do justice to the Government of the United States rather than to remove any cause of jealousy that might exist between two cities in the State of Florida. I merely offer that as a suggestion.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not in accord with the confessions I heard before the Committee on Ways and Means when the matter was before that committee.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, we have to have orderly proceedings here. These gentlemen must first address the Chair when they seek the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. For a number of years, or at least months, in this House we attempted to reduce the number of these districts and failed after, I think, a considerable struggle on the floor of the House. Then, if I understand the gentleman correctly, there was included in an appropriation bill an amendment, which was subject to a point of order, but the point of order was not made, and that provision became law; and the reform was accomplished by the executive department when the legislative department had failed. Is that true?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The legislative department had failed to specifically cut out the districts. I think the legislative department did its share of the reform when it conferred the authority upon the executive department, and in my opinion work of that character is much better done in this way.

Mr. MURDOCK. That may be true, but the remarkable thing about this is that there was once a very close contest on that proposition, and this body divided almost evenly, though the proposition was defeated, and afterwards, when anyone could have killed the legislation by making a point of order, no one made the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there was a good reason for it. When the bill was brought into the House establishing districts and abolishing districts every Member who represented a district in which there was a port or a subport to be specifically abolished was put in a position where, unless the people of his district wanted those ports and subports abolished, he was compelled to antagonize the bill. By proceeding in the matter in an entirely different manner, and not singling out any district or subport to be abolished, but conferring the authority upon the Executive, it was much easier for everyone to acquiesce in what was proposed to be done.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, every gentleman believed that his case was so fair and just that the Executive would sustain him?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] ought to be left in the RECORD unchallenged, to the effect that the legislative branch of the Government did not have anything to do with this reform. The executive branch of the Government would not have accomplished this reform except for the initiative of the legislative branch, and the result is that the legislative branch ought to have the credit or the odium, as the case may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It ought to have the credit for passing the legislation, that is true; but it could not do in detail what the Executive did.

Mr. GARNER. It is so much easier for the Executive to determine where the customs can be collected most conveniently and economically that therefore it was left to the Executive to work out the different districts.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's recollection is at fault. The first bill I brought in here was against one of the most obnoxious of these ports. I think the cost of collecting was something over $1,000, and the amount collected was less than a dollar. I thought that would go through without any trouble, but when I tried to get the bill up I found that there was a combination all over the House against it, and I think I am justified in speaking from the RECORD and the history of it. The Treasury Department had reported against all of these little ports where there was nothing collected, or next to nothing, and a large salary or expense attached to its collection, but every man who had one of these ports got his friends to combine against the measure, and I could not get enough votes to enable me to have consideration of the bill, although the bill was so extremely meritorious, and my fight was made along that line, continuing through two or three Congresses. I want to acknowledge the greater power that my friend had by reason of his being on the Committee on Appropriations, and being able to get this thing through without these people knowing they were being hit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I may say to my colleague, that having failed dismally in the attempt to effect this reform, and made an equally dismal failure to reform the tariff, the Democratic Party proceeded to do both, to the satisfaction of the country.

Mr. PAYNE. And I want to say to my colleague in regard to that that he is recognizing that I initiated this reform, and that before a great many days have rolled around he will recognize that I initiated a great reform in 1909.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think this ought to be stated: It has been repeatedly said and inferred that the passage of this provision was obtained by hiding from the House its true import. That is not the fact. The fact was that the report of the Committee on Appropriations, as is always true, showed plainly that it was legislation and subject to a point of order.

Now, when the committee put that in its report, it is not responsible if gentlemen have not either intelligence enough or diligence enough to understand what is proposed; but the thing was done with the perfect knowledge of all of those who took the trouble to inform themselves.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. I recall exactly the hour when that provision went through this Committee of the Whole House. There were not 20 Members on the floor of the House. It was about half past 1 o'clock, and I remember distinctly the gentleman from New York and one or two others got to the point just about when everybody was at lunch for the purpose of letting this get through without anybody making the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, the gentleman from New York had no control over the matter. The bill was being read under the five-minute rule. The committee printed in its report the provision as new legislation, subject to a point of order. Simply because gentlemen think more of their stomachs than they do of legislation is no reason why they should criticize those who have effected reforms in the public service.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I want to say when the matter was up in the House I wanted to get on my feet and commend the gentleman and his committee for their action and urge that it be adopted, but for fear I would defeat the whole business I did not dare do so. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman quite sure the provision which was enacted into law is the same provision which was reported by the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my recollection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's recollection is usually very good and may be good in this case although that is not my recollection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I have refreshed my recollection.

Mr. MANN. If the clerk of the committee says so, that goes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my recollection.

Mr. MANN. I remember very well when this particular provision was up, and I suppose the gentleman from New York will not undertake to say that either he or the Democratic side is entitled to all the credit of putting that into law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; there is something for which Members on both sides are entitled to credit. I will say to the gentleman I did not get the Marine Band to play when this item was reached in order to call attention to it.

Mr. MANN. I think it is fair to say, as a parliamentary proposition, that in view of the previous attempts that have been made to pass a bill of this kind, coming from the Ways and Means Committee, and coming up in the regular order and attracting considerable attention, that there was an understanding in the House among some gentlemen on both sides of the House that this desirable legislation, which might affect certain districts, should not be advertised, but should be put into law in an indefinite way, so that the reform might be accomplished, which never would have been accomplished by a direct bill in this House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is safe to say that no great administrative reform in 30 years has been accomplished that has not been accomplished by provisions incorporated in appropriation bills. That is not attributing any particular credit to Members who serve on committees who have charge of these appropriation bills, but it seems to be the only effective manner of getting legislation that is beneficial and remedial. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the President now have authority to rearrange a customs collection district?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; he has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then, if a movement is under way on the Pacific coast by which it is proposed to take off a portion of the Puget Sound, Wash., district and attach it to the Portland, Oreg., district, and has progressed to such an extent that many commercial clubs are passing resolutions against such a step, I would like to ask the gentleman if that would indicate that some arrangement or knowledge of this had been had out there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I have no knowledge of a movement on the Pacific coast. This power is now possessed by the President relative to internal-revenue districts. It is a proper power for him to possess relative to collection districts, and it is assumed that whoever may be President will exercise this power in the interest of the public service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, now, I thought the last rearrangement was made after exhaustive examination——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be that on the Pacific coast there should be some rearrangement of the districts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It has been less than two years since a considerable effort was required to preserve the peace on Puget Sound in connection with the removal of the customs headquarters from Port Townsend, and now here comes an effort within the last two or three months to transfer a portion of that district to the Portland district, and this proposed clause would seem to make the way clear for the consummation of it, provided sufficient "puli" is exercised.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not inserted with any knowledge or any reference to the condition existing there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am very glad to know it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS requests leave of absence for two weeks on account of personal business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2359. An act for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore;

S. 6101. An act to grant the consent of Congress for the city of Lawrence, county of Essex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimac River; and

S. 5701. An act providing for the disposal of certain lands in block 32 in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5701. An act providing for the disposal of certain lands in block 32 in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2359. An act for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore; to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8688. An act for the relief of Lucien P. Rogers; and

H. R. 15110. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept conveyance of title to certain land between the post-office site and Madison Street, in the city of Thomasville, Ga.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the general deficiency bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on the general deficiency bill, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1026).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 158 to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 158: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 158, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To pay the amounts ascertained and certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury, during the fiscal year 1915, to be due under existing laws and pursuant to the provisions of the act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved July 6, 1914, $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no agent or attorney shall demand or accept for his services in connection with the prosecution or collection of claims hereunder any sum in excess of 10 per cent of the amount allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury to any claimant under the said act of July 6, 1914. Any person violating this provision shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, or both, and shall be disbarred from practice before the Treasury Department."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
T. U. SISSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
N. P. BRYAN,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate No. 158 to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to the said amendment, namely:

In lieu of the amendment of the Senate the following is recommended as a substitute therefor:

"To pay the amounts ascertained and certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury, during the fiscal year 1915, to be due under existing laws and pursuant to the provisions of the act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved July 6, 1914, $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no agent or attorney shall demand or accept for his services in connection with the prosecution or collection of claims hereunder any sum in excess of 10 per cent of the amount allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury to any claimant under the said act of July 6, 1914. Any person violating this provision shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months, or both, and shall be disbarred from practice before the Treasury Department."

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
T. U. SISSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this is a final report on the general deficiency bill, and as agreed on it carries $6,075,909.17, $242,056.12 less than the bill passed by the Senate. It was increased over the amount as passed by the House $1,481,543.75. In this sum is included $1,038,685 for public buildings, $100,358.05 returned money deposited by the American Surety Co. as a result of a judgment, $75,000 toward the Francis Scott Key monument, $58,931.24 certified audited accounts, $175,000 for the pay of those Confederate officers of the Regular Army who afterwards entered the Confederate service. So that out of the $1,481,543.75 agreed to by the House, $1,147,974.29 are for the items just read. The total deficiencies appropriated at this session for 1914 and prior years, including $8,650,679.98 on account of the Mexican situation, aggregate $23,538,366.95. This sum is less than total deficiencies provided at last session of last Congress for 1913 and prior years by $4,536,545.36.

Mr. Speaker, when the bill was before the House the other day there was considerable discussion about the appropriation of $175,000 to pay certain longevity ration claims of officers who had been relieved from disabilities under the repeal of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The act repealing that provision was approved on the 6th of July. During the discussion there was some misapprehension on both sides as to what the actual situation was relative to the existence of the statute of limitations. At my request the law clerk of the Auditor for the War Department prepared a memorandum, in which he sets forth the history of the legislation under which these claims have arisen, together with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the various comptrollers which affect these claims.

Upon careful examination it was ascertained that, in addition to others, I had been somewhat in error as to the position I had taken and the statements I had made. So the managers upon the part of the House in conference with the Senate modified the amendment which was in controversy, so that those officers who had left the Regular Army and afterwards entered the Confederate service, and whose claims, if any, were barred by section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, and who had the disability removed by repeal of that section of the Revised Statutes, are enabled under the provision agreed upon to be treated exactly as if that section of the Revised Statutes had never been passed. The managers upon the part of the House agreed to the appropriation of $175,000, with appropriate langunge, so that the pending claims, which may be audited and certified during the current fiscal year, of this particular class of officers, may be paid. This puts these claims on exactly the same footing as certain claims of officers who did not leave the Regular Army. I stated in the discussion the other day that I understood that was the purpose of Congress in passing the act repealing section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. I believe I express the desire of this House to carry out the purpose of that act and to do nothing else. Conferences were had not only with those representing the Senate but with gentlemen who had taken part in that discussion the other day upon both sides, and this amendment carries out what was believed to be the intention of the Congress and acceded to by gentlemen upon both sides.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing this memorandum prepared by the law clerk of the Auditor for the War Department, so that there may be preserved in the RECORD an accurate statement of the law and the precedents under which these claims arise.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. How long is the statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is six and one-half typewritten pages.

Mr. MANN. And what is the effect of the statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the most important feature of it is that we were under the impression, in the discussion the other day, that there was a statute of limitations which affected these claims. It seems that there is no statute of limitations, but that decision on the 20th of June, 1890, by Comptroller Gilkeson, in which he overruled the decision of his predecessor of May 8, 1889, held that the Watson decision in the United States Supreme Court gave an officer of the Army a right to have cadet service credited in computing longevity pay if he brought suit in the Court of Claims within six years of the time his right accrued. And it went on to hold that in the claims over which the Court of Claims, and consequently the Supreme Court, had no jurisdiction, accounting officers were not legally bound to follow the conclusions in the Watson case. I believe the information contained in the statement will be of value to the Members of the House, so as to clear up any misunderstanding that may exist as to what the law actually is.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman I wish to be heard on the proposition. I am opposed to the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman object to inserting this statement in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. I was not going to object to that. The only question was as to whether we were going to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as a part of his remarks the statement referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Following is the statement referred to:

LAWS RELATING TO LONGEVITY PAY.

By the act of July 5, 1838 (5 Stat. L., 258), it was provided in section 15 thereof that "every commissioned officer of the line or staff, exclusive of general officers, shall be entitled to receive one additional ration per diem for every five years he may have served or shall serve in the Army of the United States * * *."

The first section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L., 434), directs that "in computing the length of service of any officer of the Army, in order to determine what allowance and payment of additional or longevity rations he is entitled to, and also in fixing the relative rank to be given to an officer as between himself and others having the same grade and date of appointment and commission, there shall be taken into account and credited to such officer whatever time he may have actually served, whether continuously or at different periods, as a commissioned officer of the United States, either in the Regular Army or, since the 19th day of April, 1861, in the Volunteer Service, either under appointment or commission from the governor of a State or from the President of the United States * * *."

By the ninth section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L., 423), it was enacted:

"That section 15 of the 'act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved July 5, 1838, be amended so that general officers shall not hereafter be excluded from receiving the additional ration for every five years' service; and it is hereby further provided that officers on the retired list of the Army shall have the same allowance of additional rations for every five years' service as officers in active service."

The twenty-fourth section of the act of July 15, 1870 (16 Stat. L., 320), provides, among other things, that "* * * there shall be allowed and paid to each and every commissioned officer below the rank of brigadier general, including chaplains and others having assimilated rank or pay, 10 per cent of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years of service: Provided, That the total amount of such increase for length of service shall in no case exceed 40 per cent on the yearly pay of his grade as established by this act: And provided further, That the pay of a colonel shall in no case exceed $4,500 per annum, nor the pay of a lieutenant colonel $4,000 per annum, and these sums shall be in full of all commutation of quarters, fuel, forage, servants' wages and clothing, longevity rations, and all allowances of every name and nature whatever, and shall be paid monthly by the paymaster * * *."

These provisions of the act of July 15, 1870, were incorporated, with some slight changes in phraseology, in sections 1262 and 1263 of the Revised Statutes. As they appear in the revision of 1873 they are as follows:

"SEC. 1262. There shall be allowed and paid to each commissioned officer below the rank of brigadier general, including chaplains and others having assimilated rank or pay, 10 per cent of their current yearly pay for each term of five years of service.

"SEC. 1263. The total amount of such increase for length of service shall in no case exceed 40 per cent on the yearly pay of the grade as provided by law."

By section 7, act of June 18, 1878 (20 Stat. L., 150), it was provided that "on and after the passage of this act all officers of the Army of the United States who have served as officers in the Volunteer forces during the war of the rebellion, or as enlisted men in the Armies of the United States, Regular or Volunteer, shall be, and are hereby, credited with the full time they may have served as such officers and as such enlisted men in computing their service for longevity pay and retirement." * * *

In the Army appropriation act of February 24, 1881 (21 Stat. L., 346), under the subhead "For pay of the Army," provision is made for "additional pay to officers for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay, and the actual time of service in the Army or Navy, or both, shall be allowed all officers in computing their pay."

The Army appropriation act of June 30, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 117), makes a similar provision, and adds the following:

"Provided, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1882, the 10 per cent increase for length of service allowed certain officers by section 1262 of the Revised Statutes shall be computed on the yearly pay of the grade fixed by sections 1261 and 1274 of the Revised Statutes * * *."

In the acts making appropriations for the support of the Army passed since the act of June 30, 1882, supra, the language used as longevity pay has been substantially as follows:

"For additional pay for length of service, to be paid with their current monthly pay."

Since the passage of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 569–594), cadet service has been eliminated from any computation in respect to length of service of an officer in the Army, section 6 of that act providing:

"That hereafter the service of a cadet who may hereafter be appointed to the United States Military Academy or to the Naval Academy shall not be counted in computing for any purpose the length of service of any officer of the Army."

CADET SERVICE AS AFFECTING LONGEVITY PAY.

Within a short time after the passage of the act of July 5, 1838, supra, the second comptroller was called upon to construe section 15 thereof in respect to its scope as to character of service to be counted in computing longevity rations. He held that service as a cadet at West Point could not be counted in such computation (1 Dig. Second Comp. Dec., sec. 1873), and the practice thus established obtained without exception until May 8, 1889 (15 Comp. Dec., 798). Longevity rations were allowable under the practice stated for service as a commissioned officer of the Regular Army only, and were calculated from the date of the acceptance of the officer's commission. (1 Dig. Sec. Comp. Dec., secs. 1874, 1875, 1876.) Until many years after the Civil War no one interested ever doubted the construction placed on the act of 1838 by the accounting officers who had thus committed the Government, on the Executive side at least, to the theory that longevity rations were allowable for service as commissioned officers only in the Regular Army. This construction was acquiesced in by Congress and the courts over a long period, all of which strengthened the belief in the accounting and administrative officers of the Government that the practice referred to was correct in principle and just in fact.

The provisions of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 St. L., 434), giving to those officers of the Army who had served as volunteers during the Civil War the right to have counted in computing longevity rations and relative rank time served as a commissioned officer, whether regular or volunteer, were regarded by the accounting officers as a direct and positive affirmance by Congress of the then prevailing practice. It is worthy of passing note that this act of Congress was not considered by the Supreme Court when the Watson case (130 U. S., 80) was before it, which fact has led to considerable embarrassment in the Treasury Department in trying to effectuate the real intent of the longevity statutes.

After the passage of the act of February 24, 1881, supra, Charles Morton, who was admitted to the Military Academy as a cadet July 1, 1865, and who had not been credited in respect to longevity pay with the period spent at West Point, brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover the sum of $169.07, as withheld from him between February 24, 1881, and March 31, 1883, which sum represented the additional pay he would have been entitled to if service in the Military Academy had been counted as service in the Army. The Court of Claims gave judgment in his favor, and the case went to the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. It was held by the Supreme Court (112 U. S., 1) that the time of service of a cadet in the Military Academy is to be regarded as "actual time of service in the Army" within the meaning of the act of February 24, 1881, and the act of June 30, 1882, in computing longevity pay, and the judgment of the Court of Claims was affirmed. No criticism can be offered to this decision, for it is apparent that since February 24, 1881, at least, cadet service being actual service in the Army, though not commissioned service, is nevertheless, under the act of that date, properly countable in computing longevity pay.

In the case of the United States v. Watson (150 U. S., 80) the court, without considering or having brought to its attention the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L., 434), passed upon section 15, act of July 5, 1838, and held that cadet service should be counted in determining longevity pay. This case gave rise to much misunderstanding and contrary holdings by the accounting officers. It was decided March 11, 1889. On May 8, 1889, Second Comptroller Butler directed that in computing longevity rations for service between July 5, 1838, and March 1, 1867, inclusive, prior service as a cadet, as an enlisted man, or as a commissioned officer, regular or volunteer, should be counted; that from March 2, 1867, to July 14, 1870, inclusive as to both dates, service as a commissioned officer only should be counted, a volunteer officer being restricted to service performed after April 19, 1861; and that after July 15, 1870, all services should be counted, whether as commissioned officer or otherwise.

On June 20, 1890, Second Comptroller Gilkeson overruled and reversed the decision of his predecessor of May 8, 1889, and directed the disallowance of all claims pending before his office or before the office of the Auditor for the War Department, numbering, it is said by Mr. Gilkeson, several thousand, and amounting in value, if allowable, at "any sum ranging between one million and a half to two million and a half dollars," all of which claims had been filed as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Watson case, supra, and the decision of Mr. Butler defining the scope of the holding of the court as pertaining to the accounting officers of the Government.

The Gilkeson decision held, for the reasons therein stated, that the Watson decision gave to an officer of the Army the right to have cadet service credited in computing longevity pay, if he brought suit in the Court of Claims within six years from the time his right accrued, and that as to claims over which the Court of Claims, and consequently the Supreme Court, had no jurisdiction, the accounting officers were not legally bound to follow the conclusions of the Watson case.

The effect of the Gilkeson decision was to restore the practice which had prevailed before May 8, 1889, and the practice thus restored remained in force from June 20, 1890, to May 18, 1908, when Assistant Comptroller Mitchell held that the service of a cadet at the Military Academy is service within the meaning of the act of July 5, 1838, and should be counted in computing an officer's longevity pay. No discussion of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L., 434), in its relation to the act of 1838 is to be found in the Mitchell decision, nor is mention made of the case of United States v. Sweeny (157 U. S., 281), wherein there is a later determination of some of the principles involved than will be found in the Watson case.

While the Sweeny case had to do with volunteer service, it refers to the practice obtaining under the act of 1838 before the passage of the act of 1867. Referring to officers of the Army, the court says of those who had previously had volunteer service:

"Their time of service as such volunteers never seems to have been computed in estimating the five years, after which they were entitled to longevity rations, until the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat., 434, ch. 159), entitled 'An act declaring and fixing the rights of volunteers as a part of the Army,' the first section of which provided that 'in computing the length of service of any officer of the Army in order to determine what allowance and payment of additional or longevity rations he is entitled to, * * * there shall be taken into account and credited to such officer whatever time he may have actually served, whether continuously or at different periods, as a commissioned officer of the United States, either in the Regular Army, or since the 19th day of April, 1861, in the volunteer service, either under appointment or commission from the governor of a State or the President of the United States.'"

It seems to us this act is decisive of the question. It provides in substance that in estimating the length of service for the payment of longevity rations he shall be credited both for his service as an officer of the Regular Army, or, since the 19th day of April, 1861, as an officer of the volunteer service. The object of the act was evidently, first, to extend to such volunteer officers as had served in the Army since the breaking out of the Civil War the same privilege with respect to longevity rations as had, by the act of 1838 been already secured to officers of the Regular Army; and, second, to limit that privilege to those who had served since that date.

The point of the Sweeny decision seems to be that it emphasizes the fact that the act of 1867, construed by it, did not set in force a new practice to be followed in computing longevity pay, but only gave to a new class of officers the right to have their longevity pay computed in accordance with the then prevailing practice under the act of 1838; and, as stated in this act of 1867, such computation was to be based on service as a commissioned officer.

ESTIMATES.

From the foundation of the Military Academy to the class of 1867, inclusive, there were graduated 2,218 cadets.

From the first to the class of 1881, inclusive, 2,931 cadets.

As has been said, there is no doubt now that the act of February 24, 1881, authorized the counting of cadet service after its passage in computing longevity pay, and the practice has been to do so.

Following the Watson decision in 1889 many hundred, according to Mr. Gilkeson several thousand, claims were filed for longevity pay, based on cadet service. These were all rejected with the exception of three claims, so far as known.

After the decision of Assistant Comptroller Mitchell in the Brodie case, May 18, 1908, about 1,000 claims were filed in which cadet service was a factor. Nearly all of these have been allowed. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, July 24, 1914, contains a list made up from claims certified to Congress for payment containing 953 names of those who graduated from West Point and whose claims presumptively were for longevity pay based on cadet service. It is said by the representative of a firm of local attorneys who is well posted in such matters that there are probably about 500 officers who have never made application for longevity pay in which cadet service is a factor and who, or whose heirs, might secure pay under the Mitchell decision. It is assumed that the beneficiaries under act of July 6, 1914, Public, No. 125, are included in the 500.

There were 266 officers of the United States Army who left it after November 1, 1860, to enter the service of the Confederacy, of whom 187 were graduates of the Military Academy. Of the remaining 99 there were several who had been at the academy for periods of varying length, and a number who served as volunteers during the Mexican War.

Under the Brodie decision the average sum allowed in each case certified is between $845 and $900, as nearly as can be ascertained. About $1,000,000 has been appropriated by Congress to pay these claims. Each claim, however, carried in it, probably, other items than longevity pay. If there are still 500 cases unadjudicated, and if the average value of each of them is not greater than the claims heretofore allowed, probably $500,000 would suffice to pay them; but if such an appropriation should be made the equally meritorious claims disallowed between June 20, 1890, and May 18, 1908, perhaps 1,500 in number, would be left forever barred under existing practice. If provision should be made to reopen and allow the 1,500 cases referred to, probably $2,000,000 would be needed to pay them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire?

Mr. MANN. I would like to have 10 minutes to begin with.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I confess I do not know just what effect the provision in the conference report would be where it says to pay the amount ascertained and certified, and so forth, to be due under existing law and pursuant to the provisions of the act to repeal, which we recently repealed. The old longevity law under which they arise has been repealed and a new law substituted for it. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, if I may, what his opinion is in reference to the expression "to be due under existing laws"? How far does that allow a claim under the act of 1838 which was long since repealed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state to the gentleman that the opinion of the law officers in the Office of the Auditor for the War Department was that that expression was not necessary and was not of any value, but in order to get an agreement on the item it was inserted. The purpose of this is to permit the payment of those claims filed under the act of 1838, providing for additional longevity; that for every five years additional service——

Mr. MANN. What I am trying to get is light on this provision. If the gentleman says it is not necessary and is of no value, what is it inserted for, and at whose suggestion was it inserted?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, some harmless language is frequently inserted in some of these provisions in order to allay dissatisfaction with the provisions.

Mr. MANN. I will say that when harmless language is inserted in anything that claim agents have anything to do with, it is inserted for a reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. The mere statement that the act of July 6, 1914, had been passed did not seem to be sufficient. This was to make certain, if it could be done, the right which it was believed would have existed had it not been for the enactment of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. The suggestion was made that there should be incorporated in the provision a reference to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Watson case.

Mr. MANN. I am not inquiring about what is not in the report, but what is in the report. As to that the gentleman has given no answer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Sometimes it is informing to know what the motive was which actuated those who agreed to a thing.

Mr. MANN. I want to make a statement, and——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me——

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I had no desire in the beginning, and have no desire now, to have any appropriation made for this particular case that does not apply to the Union officers under the present law. Now, when this proposition was written out, striking out the language of the Senate and inserting this new language, they described this case in the proposal as shown by the Clerk, I will say, as appropriating some $175,000 under the act of July 6, 1914. I think it was; that is, the act repealing section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. The suggestion came from myself to the committee, not from any claim agent, that I did not think that language alone was sufficient to define it, because these claims had no standing under section 3480 or the act repealing it It was under the general law that they had a claim at all, and that repeal of section 3480 only wiped out the bar or the impediment in the way. It was at my request that they put in the language that they should pay claims that were authorized under existing law, those cases where the bar of section 3480 was removed; so that I am personally responsible for the insertion, and no one else, whether it is wrong or right.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If I get the gist of the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] with reference to this provision, it is this, that——

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to yield to enable the gentleman to state the case.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to see if the gentleman from Illinois understood the matter as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can tell better after I have finished my statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Well, if the gentleman does not desire to yield, all right.

Mr. MANN. Before I have stated my case I do not desire to have some one else state it.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to state what I understood to be the interpretation of this provision by the gentleman from New York, and then to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it was his interpretation. I do not care to take the time of the gentleman from Illinois if he does not want me to.

Mr. MANN. I think we would get along better not to discuss it in that way. I think if the Treasury officials will construe this amendment in the way it reads, it would amount to nothing. But as it is not to be supposed that Congress enacts a law with the intention of doing nothing, they can not, probably, and would not so construe it. These Federal officers have no claims under existing law. The claims are under laws which have long since been repealed.

Now, what are the facts in the case? Under the act of 1838 there was a longevity allowance of one extra ration a day for every five years of service in the Army.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will, although it seems to me that it would be better that I should be allowed to make a consecutive statement.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman states that the act of 1838 was repealed. The act of 1838 was amended some time in the forties, was it not?

Mr. MANN. I think not. I am not sure about that.

Mr. SISSON. That act is still in existence, is it not?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so. The longevity act is entirely different now from what it was then, although the effect is probably very much the same. The act of 1838—and it is not to this point that I raised awhile ago that I am now devoting my discussion—provided an additional ration per day for every five years' service. I do not know what the ration was worth. Of course, it was commuted. Probably it was in the neighborhood of 40 cents a day. Since that time Congress passed a law so as to make the longevity pay amount to an increase of 10 per cent for each five years' service instead of an extra ration per day for each five years' service.

Some years ago the question arose as to whether West Point service, four years at West Point, was to be counted as service in the Army in fixing the longevity pay. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that it was. It first decided that it was under the present law providing for an increase of 10 per cent for each five years. It afterwards decided that the West Point service was to be counted in fixing the longevity pay under the act of 1838, which was one ration per day for each five years' service. Claim agents or some one filed a claim for Gen. Grant, or for his estate, and that claim was allowed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman want some more time?

Mr. MANN. I would like to have 10 minutes. I want to proceed.

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. The claim of Gen. Grant was allowed by the comptroller in 1889. At the same time the claim of Gen. Rosecrans, I think it was, was allowed. Those two claims were the only claims allowed by the comptroller in 1889. Having been allowed by the comptroller, nearly all, or at least a very large number of the officers and their estates, filed claims with the auditor. It is stated that these claims amounted, as filed, to the sum of $2,500,000, or from a million and a half to three million dollars. No one knows the exact amount. The matter came up again with the new comptroller a short time after the first decision, and in 1890 Comptroller Gilkeson made a decision that these claims were not allowable; that the claims had been settled and the accounts of the officers had been settled; that the matter was disposed of; and although if the claims were new and arising under current conditions they would have to be allowed under the decision of the Supreme Court; that they were barred; and the comptroller directed that all of these claims pending, to the extent of from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000, be disallowed, and they were disallowed.

A number of the people having these claims, or their claim agents, secured the passage of resolutions in the Senate referring them to the Court of Claims, and they were referred, and the Court of Claims made findings; and a great many of them finding the amounts, finding that, so far as the Court of Claims was concerned, they were barred by the statute of limitations.

Those claims have been coming over to the House from the Senate in omnibus claim bills now for some time. None of them has been paid in a claim bill, but in 1908 Officer Brodie, a friend of the then administration it is understood, filed a claim, and the comptroller reversed the former ruling, and held that this longevity claim was good, and that there was no bar by the statute of limitations, but that his ruling could not affect this large number of claims which had been disallowed. They could not reopen these claims, supposed to amount, as I said before, to $2,500,000.

Among those claims which were disallowed, and which can not now be paid, except by direct act of Congress, are the claims of Gen. Philip Sheridan, Gen. Sherman, and a great number of other Union officers whose names are household words in the country.

These claims had been filed through claim agents to this very large amount and were disallowed. They are barred. But claims which have not been filed and disallowed under the decision of Comptroller Gilkeson in 1890 might be filed afterwards under the decision of the Brodie case and allowed. Some of them have been so filed and allowed. I think no one knows how much they amount to. It was stated here the other day by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that they amounted to the neighborhood of $1,000,000. I think that is based upon the appropriations which have been made in the deficiency bill in reference to the pay of the Army, which amounted to something over $900,000; but how much of that is for these claims I do not know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will refer to the RECORD——

Mr. MANN. I have the RECORD right before me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD I did not prepare the list, but I published a list showing the names and the amounts.

Mr. MANN. Yes; the gentleman from Alabama published in the RECORD the other day a list of the names and amounts; also a letter from Richard P. Whiteley, who is a claim attorney, as I understand it. It was a perfectly proper communication for the gentleman to print. I am taking no exception to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think Mr. Whiteley is a general attorney for the firm of Herbert & Micou, Mr. Herbert being formerly Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MANN. But he is interested in these claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; he represents some of these claims.

Mr. MANN. He constantly refers to these claims, which he specifies as claims of northern officers. It runs through his letter in a number of cases, although he knew, if he knew anything about the claims when he wrote the letter, that they were not confined to northern officers, and that these claims which have been allowed under the Brodie decision have been allowed to estates of old officers in the South as well as in the North, and allowed to cadets who entered the academy up to 1897, after the war. There has been no distinction between the northern and the southern officers, so far as that is concerned. But the claims which have been disallowed, including the Sheridan and Sherman claims, to the extent of $2,500,000, are still disallowed. There is no provision for their payment. There is no intention to pay them.

Now, of course, these Confederate officers, 173 of them I believe it is stated in the letter, did not have their claims disallowed under the Gilkeson decision, because they could not then file claims on account of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes. Congress having repealed that section, they may now file claims; and if they have claims, they have the same right now to file their claims in the auditor's office and have them allowed as anyone else whose claim has not been disallowed. But here is a proposition to separate out these few Confederate officers and make an appropriation in advance of the allowance of their claims to pay them, if the auditor shall allow them, when we make no provision for the payment of the $2,500,000 due to the officers, as stated here, many of them at least of the Northern Army. The proposition here is to pay the claim of the estate of "Stonewall" Jackson, for whom I have the highest regard, but not to pay the claim of Gen. Philip Sheridan; to pay the claim of the Gen. Lee estate, but not to pay the claim of the Gen. Sherman estate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry to detain the House.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe myself that any of these longevity claims should be paid. Comptroller Gilkeson referred this matter to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General said, among other things:

> The principle that a man must be assumed to know the law is indispensable to the administration of government and to the finality of settlements made by it and by individuals.
> If, however, a party may thus enter into such a settlement, and when, afterwards, the law shall be ascertained to be more favorable to him than the view upon which he acted, that settlement may be wiped out and the parties required to settle de novo, the public policy which favors compromises would be reversed. It is better that no settlement be made than that one be made which is ineffectual.

All these claims of the officers were settled as they went along. They received the pay which they believed they were to get when they went into the Army and while they were serving in the Army. They received the pay which the Government understood it was paying to officers in the Army, which Congress appropriated for, and which it understood the officers were to receive. They received the pay that everybody understood they were to receive.

Now, after this lapse of nearly eight years, it is proposed, not to pay the officers, but to pay their estates, and to pay those particularly of officers who left the Army to join the Confederacy, which act we have now forgiven, as far as the North is concerned, but not to pay officers who remained in the Union Army. Sheridan and Sherman are not to have their claims paid, but the others who left are to have their claims paid, and payment authorized before they have been presented and audited.

I do not think we ought to pay any of them, but I am very sure that if we pay them, we ought not to refuse to pay the claims of those officers who remained in the Army and pay those of the officers who left the Army.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? I want to get this right.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. These officers whose claims were disallowed by the Gilkeson decision could not be paid under this or any other existing law?

Mr. MANN. They could not, and they can not be reopened except by an act of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I want to take issue with the statement that the gentleman made, and I will ask him to cite me the authority. He stated that the act of July 5, 1838, had been repealed. I have been unable to find any such repeal, and the statement from the auditor's office does not cite any repeal. If the gentleman has the reference, I would like to have him give it.

Mr. MANN. I have no reference to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think, then, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. I am not mistaken; it is patent to anybody. That law is not now in force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not in force, but that is different; it is not repealed.

Mr. MANN. It was repealed by the new act. I am not saying that the repeal barred the payment of the claims which arose under the act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; and I take issue with the gentleman about the actual repeal.

Mr. MANN. Of course it has been repealed, for it is not in force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A good many statutes are on the books that are not in force and which are not repealed. I have never been able to find an act where it is repealed, and the statement which the gentleman printed in the RECORD does not disclose any such repeal.

Mr. MANN. If we fix the salary of the Secretary of State, as we did, at $10,000 a year—and I think that is the way it is printed in the statute—and then we fix it by an act of Congress at $12,500 a year, that repeals the former provision. When we enacted a law in 1838 providing for one extra ration per day for each five years and then afterwards changed it to 10 per cent for each five years of service, that is a repeal of the prior act. It is not existing law. If it were existing law it would be in force, but it is not existing law, and no one claims that it is.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken about the repeal of that statute. The statute has been amended in that it has changed twice the amount of longevity pay; but every officer of the Army of the United States prior to that amendment did receive his longevity pay under the act of 1838. The act of 1838 is in force to-day, and is vital to-day. If the gentleman will read the entire history of all this legislation, he will find the basis upon which longevity pay is calculated, and that they have added to the ration which was provided for in 1838.

Mr. MANN. There is no substantial controversy between the gentleman and myself. I do not deny that there is a claim under the act. The gentleman uses the term "existing law." It is not important.

Mr. SISSON. There may be a question of importance about it, but the department takes a different view of it and the comptroller takes a different view of it. There is no difference of opinion as to the effect and force of the act of 1838, as it affects any claim that might arise.

Mr. MANN. There is no controversy between the gentleman and myself in regard to that. I referred to that, to begin with, under the term "existing law."

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman refers to the statute of limitations. There is no statute of limitations against any claim. Wherever the auditor decides against a claim it is simply stare decisis; it is a closed question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire how the gentleman from Mississippi got the floor?

Mr. SISSON. Because, Mr. Speaker, I have control of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SISSON. The statute of limitations does not run against any of these claims; but where a claim is presented to the auditor and the auditor decides against the claim, that is thereafter a closed question. Every claim of every kind involved in this present act, the one that is agreed to on this bill, every unaudited claim that may accrue to any Union officer that has not been settled, is to-day open for settlement by the auditor. He can audit these claims now under this bill, and the aim and object of the conferees on the part of the House was an honest effort to try and fix this law so that these men who resigned their commission would get what was due them at the time they resigned, no more and no less.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman must see the injustice of this whole proposition, because at the time these Union men filed their claims which were disallowed the men who are now to be beneficiaries of this legislation could not under the law file their claims.

Mr. SISSON. No; they could not file them.

Mr. MURDOCK. If under the law they could have filed their claims, they would have been disallowed.

Mr. SISSON. Under the statute they could not file them, but that statute was repealed, and for the express purpose of permitting them to get what the United States Government owed them at the time they resigned their commissions.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; but the difficulty here is that the Government did not owe them any more than they owed the men who did file their claims.

Mr. SISSON. We do not ask that they get any more. It was not the intention of the conferees on the part of the Senate to give them any more. It was not the intention on the part of the department, that thoroughly agrees to this language used, but an honest effort was made simply to pay these men what was honestly due them. Under the Gilkeson decision there may be some cases that perhaps should be paid.

That decision of Gilkeson was the thing that prevented their getting the pay, not the law. There may be some cases, but few of them, that perhaps ought to be allowed; but since I have been on the Committee on Appropriations, on the deficiency bill, claim after claim has been allowed by the auditor, and some of them were claims away back before the Civil War; every one of them was allowed except those claims included in the Gilkeson decision. They were audited claims, and we had to pay them or repudiate. All of the Gilkeson claims are not cases that would be involved here at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If these men had filed their claims at the time the claims were filed which were rejected, they would also have been rejected, would they not?

Mr. SISSON. I could not tell about that. I do not know.

Mr. MADDEN. The same state of facts would exist.

Mr. SISSON. No; the gentleman is wrong about that. They would have gotten, as all of the Union officers got, the pay and allowance that was allowed under the auditor's decision in 1861. We get confused because there was a change of opinions of auditors as to whether or not the Military Academy service should be counted in counting the longevity pay, and that is the thing around which all of the difficulty is revolving now, because if it had not been for the act of 1867 these men would have been allowed this amount of money, and they would have been paid by the Treasury on the auditor's audit, just exactly what they would have gotten had they remained in the Union Army. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but I can not very well get the thought out of my mind that if these men had the right to file their claims when other men did file their claims who had the right to do it, the same disposition would probably have been made of the claims that was made of the other claims.

Mr. SISSON. That is true if they had filed claims for longevity service while in the Military Academy, but every officer received his pay without having to file any claim, all along, right up until that decision of the auditor where they made an exception in the case of Gen. Grant and two other officers. Every other officer up to that time received everything that was due him when it became due. That is all that is intended, so far as I am concerned, and that was the honest intention of this statute—to include in it only those small amounts which were due the officers under the law at the time of the surrender of their commissions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the gentleman's statement now, it is that it is not intended to include these longevity claims based on West Point military service.

Mr. SISSON. That is my contention. I have not only said it in debate on the floor, but I have said it privately to the gentleman from Illinois, that I quite agree with him that the only thing that these men ought to be paid is what the Government owed them and what they would have gotten if they had received their salary on the day that they resigned their commissions.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not understand the chairman of his committee to take that view of it or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]?

Mr. SISSON. No. My understanding now is that this puts the commissioned officer who resigned his commission on the same basis that the present decision of the comptroller would put the Union officer, and the trouble, and the only trouble, in the case is that under the Gilkeson decision, where all the cases disallowed were not absolutely on longevity, though a great many of them were, some few Union officers will perhaps not be able to get what would be obtained if the construction which some gentlemen put on the language of this bill is correct, which the Confederate officers would get.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said some few. How much is the amount of those claims that were disallowed?

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman mean "disallowed"?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. There is some little controversy about that. I want to state to the gentleman that my information about it is second hand. It is contended by some that it will be something like $900,000, but I understand that these claims will amount to something like a little less than $3,000,000, of all kinds and character. I want the House to understand that I am giving it the benefit of information that may not be accurate, however, and I do not know. They say it is absolutely ascertainable now; but, if so, the reports that I have been able to get are conflicting about it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that Mr. Gilkeson, the comptroller, stated that they probably would amount to two million and a half?

Mr. SISSON. That is my recollection of his statement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said just a few Union officers.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, a great many of these Gilkeson claims that were disallowed, as I understand, were not altogether for longevity pay.

Mr. MANN. Most of them were.

Mr. SISSON. I could not tell about that.

Mr. MANN. Nearly all of them were.

Mr. SISSON. It is very much like this statement here in the RECORD. It is a difficult matter to segregate the older longevity claims from the later ones.

Mr. MANN. Of course they were not all Union officers. Many of them had probably died before the war commenced?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Some of them were claims that arose after the war was over.

Mr. SISSON. That is true.

Mr. MANN. But nearly all of the Union officers had claims pending, and they were disallowed.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want my position to be perfectly well understood. I simply want the officers who resigned their commissions in 1861 to get what was due them, as if they had gotten the pay when they resigned their commissions.

Mr. MANN. To that we do not take any exception; but in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee and of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that this would pay the longevity pay, where the same character of claims had been disallowed, does not the gentleman think we ought to be a little careful before we act?

Mr. SISSON. To be frank with the gentleman, I have no quarrel to make with him about making the legislation so that a Union officer shall get identically the same pay that a Confederate officer will get for the service rendered. That is what I am asking for, and all I want, and I will vote against any other proposition. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. There are 10 minutes left.

Mr. SISSON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better retain one minute.

Mr. SISSON. Then I yield the gentleman nine minutes. Would the gentleman from Alabama like to have more time than that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I can make that suffice.

Mr. SISSON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I would like to have 15 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to take up the time of the House in discussing this claim. I think it is probably the first time I ever appeared before the House in reference to any claim, and I would not do so now if it were not for the act of this Congress itself. On July 6 last we repealed statute 3480, that prohibited a Union officer who afterwards entered the Confederate service from filing a claim against the United States Government. It was repealed by a unanimous-consent vote of this House under the statement in the report and under the statement made by the gentleman who presented the bill to this House that the intention of repealing that statute was to allow these officers who served in the Confederate army after their Union term of service to go back and get this longevity pay that was due them under the law as it stands to-day before they entered the Confederate service.

Now, that is all there is in this proposition. Of course we recognize the fact that at one time a comptroller decided that an officer was not entitled to longevity pay based on his West Point service, but the Supreme Court of the United States decided that he is. After the decision of the Supreme Court Gen. Grant's longevity pay was allowed, based on his West Point service. Then the Gilkeson decision came along, and Gen. Sherman's pay, according to the gentleman from Illinois, was rejected by Gilkeson, and his longevity pay was not allowed based on his West Point service. Then Mitchell came along and decided that the original decision was right, that the Supreme Court decision was right, and that longevity pay should be based on West Point service. And since that time, about six or seven years ago, over 1,000 cases have been paid dating back to the time of the original service. Some of the men entered West Point dating nearly back to 1838——

Mr. MURDOCK. Eighteen hundred and twenty-nine.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Dating back to 1829, and nearly $1,000,000 has been paid out. Now, of course, we recognize that under section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, passed immediately after the war, that these Confederate officers could not have gone back and collected anything that was due them when they left the service. As a matter of fact, in most cases where these officers left the service they were paid at that time once every three months, and most of them left the actual pay due them in the Treasury of the United States, that they have never collected up to this time for service to the Government. Well, this Congress graciously repealed that statute, repealed it to allow these claims to be paid. Now, if Congress had not done it—and it did not come from the South or our section of the country; it came very graciously from that side, a bill proposed by that side of the House, presented to the House, and voted for unanimously; but, having done it, I say it would be a most ungracious thing for this Congress, after passing this repealing law for this purpose, when it comes to make an appropriation to pay the claims, to refuse to do it. That is all there is to it. We all recognize the Civil War between the States is over, and we all rejoice in that fact. Men sitting here on the floor of this House are joint owners probably of grandchildren whose grandfathers fought on both sides of that war. It is only a question of whether these old men should be paid money that was due them for services rendered before the Civil War in accordance with the law that exists to-day, not the law that existed under the Gilkeson decision. Now, there are three classes of cases that are involved in these longevity claims. There is the class of claims of Confederate soldiers, whom the bar of disability was lifted on the 6th of this July. The other class of claims are the claims of Union soldiers who always stayed in the Union Army, who filed their claims either before Gilkeson became comptroller or after he went out of office. They have all been paid so far as their claims have been audited. This very Congress has paid some of them, as shown in the list I published on last Friday.

In the last Congress we paid something over $200,000 of them. Now, all of these men have been paid, but there are some unfortunates. There were a certain number of Union officers who filed their claims for audit when Mr. Gilkeson was comptroller, and he rejected them. Now, when an applicant's claim is audited that is the end of it so far as the comptroller's office is concerned. After that time it is only made a claim. Now, this case went off the other day on the supposition, as it was asserted here, that there was a bar of the statute of limitation, and these Union officers only drew their pay back for six years, whereas these Confederate officers could draw back to the beginning. Now, that was entirely a misapprehension of the fact. There is not any statute of limitation at all, so far as the comptroller is concerned, and these cases have all been paid under the comptroller's decision, and the ones you have paid have been paid from the very beginning. There is only one thing that stands in the way of any of them, and that is that the men who unfortunately went before Gilkeson and got reversed can not go back in the auditor's office and get a reaudited claim.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will my friend from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask my friend from Alabama why Congress could not include the compensation of those men who were barred by Gilkeson while he was comptroller, and why should it not be done now? Would not common justice and fairness demand this?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no reason, in my judgment, why it should not. Now just eliminate, just wipe out entirely, these Confederate claims. I am not much of a claim man. As I say, this is the first time in 20 years that I have ever appeared on the floor of this House talking about a claim, and I would not do it now except I believe it would be an ungracious act of this Congress, after inviting these men to present their claims, not to pay them. But, leaving out these Confederate claims entirely, I agree with what the gentleman from New York says, that it was right for Gen. Grant's heirs to get his longevity pay based on his West Point service, which they got, and it is equally right for the heirs of Gen. Sherman to get his longevity pay based on his West Point service. Now, that is all there is to it.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. KONOP. You state there is no statute of limitations barring these claims. Now, since that section—3840—has been repealed, why can not these Confederate officers now file their claims, just like the Union officers, in the comptroller's office?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They have, and they will, and it is recognized by the comptroller's office they will be allowed, and therefore the appropriation is being made to pay them.

Mr. KONOP. That was sought before the claims were allowed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was sought because the claims were there. There was nothing to do with them except to add up the figures. They have been there since the beginning, and they will be due and payable before the next deficiency bill passes, and if you are going to pay them, why not pay them now? There is no question about it. There is no use of any controversy. That these men were in West Point is not controverted. The fact that they are entitled to longevity pay based on West Point service, as these other officers have been paid for the last few years, is not controverted. I ask the gentleman if, that being the case and we are going to pay them, why should we make them wait a year instead of paying them now?

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not unusual to pay these claims in this way? Are not they usually audited? Are we not anticipating them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think you are probably anticipating them for about 90 days. I am free to say that. I do not see why we should not anticipate them.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not usual to pay claims in that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is usual to put into a bill whatever is expected will have to be paid out in the intervening months.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the claims are audited?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the claims have been audited. These claims have been audited, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I take it, of course, that most of these particular generals who were graduates of West Point, both North and South, are dead?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. And probably most of their widows are dead?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that is so.

Mr. COX. Now, here is the question: Suppose a general himself is dead and that his wife is dead, then whatever is due and would go to either of them if alive would go to their children?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would go to the estate, like any other claim.

Mr. COX. Would it go any further than to the children—that is, to his nephews, nieces, or aunts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think this: If I were to die—I will not refer to my friend from Indiana—but if I were to die to-day, and there was some back pay due me as Congressman, as there is, and there was not a provision made for the Sergeant at Arms to pay it to my wife or my children, it would be an outstanding claim that my estate would have against the Government, and if for some reason they did not collect it now, there is no reason they should not collect it for my heirs, say, my grandchildren, 20 years from now.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's item follows the usual law, does it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what it does.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will my friend yield for a brief question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. How were the claims of Gen. Grant and Gen. Rosecrans paid?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Supreme Court, as has been stated here very often, decided longevity pay should be based on West Point service, and the auditor who was in the office at that time decided that Gen. Grant and Gen. Rosecrans was each entitled to his pay. It went along smoothly. They were giving this longevity pay after accounts were audited until Gilkeson came in, and then he proceeded to reverse the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated it went along smoothly. Is it not a fact that the only claims that were allowed were those of Gen. Grant and Gen. Rosecrans?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I think there were some others.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman, quoting from the report of Auditor Gilkeson, that he says there were only two claims allowed under that decision by the prior comptroller, and then one claim slipped through when he was comptroller that he did not know anything about. Those three claims were the only ones.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is necessity for any controversy on the fact as to how many claims there were.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman stated in reply to a question a while ago that this was unusual. In the last five years in the sundry civil bill two items have been carried for similar cases. As to officers of the Spanish-American War, an item is also carried anticipating arrears of pay. It is not only usual but it is a most unusual thing not to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman refreshes my mind. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] that I have no doubt that he knows that we make appropriations here every year for private pension bills that may be passed by the Congress.

Mr. SISSON. It is in anticipation. It has been carried in the sundry civil bill for 25 years.

Mr. KONOP. But pensions are authorized.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me now. This is not only authorized, but it is a debt due. It does not require any authority. It is the law, and it is a debt due, just as much as your salary is due, the moment you repealed statute 3480 that stood in the way.

You repealed section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, and when you did it you made this debt due to them just as much as it was in 1861 when these men went out of the Federal Army. It is due to-day, because you repealed that statute.

Now, there is only one other thing that I wish to state to the House. There is a discrimination here, but not growing out of the repeal of section 3480. There is a discrimination between the claims of those officers that you have paid, like the case of Gen. Grant, and claims like those of Gen. Sherman and others, which were turned down, and you made the discrimination yourselves. Those claims are pending now in the omnibus claims bill in the Senate. You can pass them when that bill comes over here by passing that bill.

Now, a great deal has been said about the amount of these claims, and I want to state this, that they will amount to the total of the graduates from the Military Academy. The total number of graduates of the Military Academy between 1802, the first class at that institution, and 1879, inclusive, is 2,826. Of this total 636 have no claims, adjusted or unadjusted, for the reason that if they graduated before 1838 they either resigned, died, or were dismissed prior to 1838, or if they graduated after 1838 they remained in the Army one year or less. This leaves a total of 2,190 possible claims, paid and unpaid, northern and southern. Of this number 1,000 northern claims have been paid already, leaving 1,190 possible claims, northern and southern. Subtracting the 173 claims of Confederate officers, there would remain 1,017. From this number there would be deducted a certain number of possible claims that would never be presented, since they extend back over 100 years, and a certain number that have been presented and disallowed, for the reason that the officer was dismissed or died when his accounts were unsettled, and when he owed a balance to the United States Government which had been offset against his longevity claim. I can not tell the number of these disallowances, but I am informed that there have been some. This would reduce the number of outstanding northern claims certainly below 1,000.

It is also to be borne in mind in this connection that in this number the largest portion of these claims are those of officers who graduated in 1879, or the years immediately preceding, and whose claims are smaller than the others. This is so, because the claims disallowed by Comptroller Gilkeson are those of officers who were in active service in 1889 at the time of the Supreme Court's decision in the Watson case, and who immediately filed their claims with the comptroller.

The larger claims, extending back a great number of years, were those of officers who were in many cases dead, and so they were not filed and disallowed. This enabled them to be paid within the last six years under Comptroller Mitchell's decision.

It is, therefore, evident that the average amount involved in the unpaid northern claims will be less than the average amount already paid. The average amount of those already paid is $852 in each case; so that if the remaining 1,000 claims of officers, excluding the Confederate claims covered by the repeal of section 3480, were all to be presented and paid, the total amount involved would be $852,000.

Now, gentlemen, instead of the proposition being what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says when he asks, "Why should you pay these Union officers who served in the Confederate Army and not pay the heirs of Gen. Sherman?"—I say the proposition really is this: Why should you have paid the heirs of Gen. Grant and keep standing here the heirs of Gen. Sherman and not pay them? Now, you have paid in the last years $994,000 of actual claims. If you will look at Friday's RECORD you will find the claims that you paid to the men who were fortunate enough not to file their claims with Gilkeson, and you have standing at the door about $852,000 of claims of brother officers, with no distinction whatever between the two sets of claimants except that they were unfortunate in filing their claims with Gilkeson.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired

Mr. SISSON. Has all time expired?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 46.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers. No, Mr. Speaker; I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman make a point of order that there is no quorum present. It is easier to vote that way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those who favor the adoption of the conference report will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 140, answered "present" 6, not voting 197, as follows:

So the conference report was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For the session:

Mr. METZ and Mr. WALLIN.

Mr. GLASS with Mr. SLEMP.

Mr. SCULLY with Mr. BROWNING.

Until further notice:

Mr. ASHBROOK with Mr. AUSTIN.

Mr. BARTLETT with Mr. AVIS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi with Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin.

Mr. CARLIN with Mr. CURRY.

Mr. CARTER with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. CLAYPOOL with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa with Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. RAINEY with Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. DUPRÉ with Mr. GILLETT.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. GOEKE with Mr. KEISTER.

Mr. JACOWAY with Mr. LAFFERTY.

Mr. LEVER with Mr. KELLEY of Michigan.

Mr. MCANDREWS with Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. WILSON of Florida with Mr. MOSS of West Virginia.

Mr. SHERWOOD with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. PARK with Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts.

Mr. REED with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut with Mr. PETERS of Maine.

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. RUPLEY.

Mr. TAGGART with Mr. VARE.

Mr. WALKER with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. WILLIAMS with Mr. WINSLOW.

Mr. RAUCH with Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia.

Mr. IGOE with Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH.

Mr. UNDERHILL with Mr. STEENERSON.

Mr. HOUSTON with Mr. LANGHAM.

Mr. GALLAGHER with Mr. HINEBAUGH.

Mr. CANTRILL with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska with Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

Mr. THOMAS with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia with Mr. MERRITT.

Mr. HARDWICK with Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas with Mr. AINEY.

Mr. LAZARO with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. LOBECK with Mr. POWERS.

Mr. GORMAN with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN.

Mr. ASWELL with Mr. CARY.

Mr. BROWN of New York with Mr. CHANDLER of New York.

Mr. STRINGER with Mr. PROUTY.

Mr. CALLAWAY with Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. KITCHIN with Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts.

Mr. ESTOPINAL with Mr. FREAR.

Mr. ADAIR with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. KREIDER.

Mr. BELL of Georgia with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. EDWARDS with Mr. GRIEST.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana with Mr. LINDQUIST.

Mr. PADGETT with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. WEAVER with Mr. WALTERS.

Mr. FAISON with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVENPORT with Mr. J. M. C. SMITH.

Mr. SUMNERS with Mr. TEMPLE.

Mr. PALMER with Mr. MOORE.

Mr. CLANCY with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

Mr. SMITH of Texas with Mr. SHREVE.

Mr. MCGILLICUDY with Mr. GUERNSEY.

Mr. HENRY with Mr. HINDS.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. FIELDS with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. KREIDER. I voted no. I find that I am paired, and I desire to change my vote to "present."

Mr. PROUTY. I voted no; but I find I am paired, and I want to withdraw that vote and to vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 158.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 158.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor may sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, on yesterday the Senate passed a resolution revoking all leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. It seems to me that we are reaching a point where we have very hard work to get a quorum in the House, and it might be wise to do the same thing. What is the special reason or necessity for this?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will say to the gentleman that we have but one special reason or necessity. We have a matter on which we wish to have a hearing, and the probabilities of getting a quorum this afternoon are good, and perhaps they will not be so good later on.

Mr. MANN. This afternoon we are going to have a very important bill up for consideration and shall be voting on amendments constantly. It is not a party matter, and I am afraid we shall need the gentleman.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I think I can assure the gentleman that we will be here when needed.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the gentleman will come in then and vote unintelligently not having heard the discussion.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The gentleman assumes a great deal when he assumes my want of intelligence on any subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I do not mean to assume the gentleman's want of intelligence, but I assume that even the gentleman from Maryland, gifted as he is, can not always tell how to vote right on a subject which he had not heard anything about.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. If the gentleman from Illinois is going to speak, I rather fear his criticism may be true.

Mr. MANN. I take it the gentleman from Maryland has a discriminating mind, and that if I made a speech he would vote the other way; although that is not what the House has just done, and I will take that back.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LONERGAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for the remainder of the week, on account of a death in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general dam bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general dam act.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if we can not agree upon some time for limit of debate on this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the requests on this side aggregate 40 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. And the requests amount to about the same on this side, but we are considerably behind. The other side has used about three times as much time as we have, and we want to equalize it. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed unlimited.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Has the gentleman made any proposition for time?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; there was so much demanded on that side, and besides, I want to use some little time myself. I think we ought to even it up.

Mr. MANN. We are in committee; why not go ahead before you agree on a limit?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 40 minutes on a side.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made no request.

Mr. ADAMSON. The proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota is for an hour on a side, but before that is done I want to make a few remarks myself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may proceed without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may proceed without limit. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to consume very much time. I would rather have the attention of gentlemen than to have more time. When I undertook to address the committee in opening the debate, my friends were so inquisitive that I was never able to get further than half an answer to a question at one time. I do not wish, however, at this time to continue in general debate on the bill, but to address myself mainly to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I deprecate the exhibition of feeling and indulgence in violent language during the discussion of this bill. I do not think gentlemen mean it, nor do I believe any gentleman on this floor merits any such language as has been used here. No man believes any Member of Congress here desires to loot the public nor permit any graft nor hurt the General Government nor rob the people. So far as I am concerned I have had a clean bill of health from all, even the most violent of those who have criticized the bill. I will take the liberty, I believe with the universal concurrence of the Committee of the Whole, to extend that acquittal to the entire membership. Such language may be indulged with impunity by outsiders who have nothing to lose but everything to gain, and who enjoy access to the sensational papers, but it is improper and unmerited here.

I have no animosity against the Federal Government, nor am I disturbed by the question of State rights. Whatever the Constitution provides for should be observed. We have a dual form of government, and the Constitution is supported best by observing both elements. It is as much a violation to ignore one as the other. Whatever is right and proper for the Federal Government to do it should do. The States should do their duty, for they are possessed of all powers not expressly delegated to the Federal Government.

What we want is a good bill. Gentlemen here who are insisting on Federal taxation virtually admit that they are worshiping a fetish and not a practical reality. They say they want a mere nominal tax to preserve the principle. The trouble is, their insistence will prevent development. I would rather forego a doubtful right of Federal taxation, and permit something to develop that the States may tax whereby to support their institutions rather than obstruct and prevent any development for any Government to tax or any people to utilize. But the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] with a blunt frankness declares that he wants to tax them enough practically to support the Government—at least enough to pay off the indebtedness of the Government. There he drifts into the visionary. Gentlemen talk as though they had control of the capital of the world and could arbitrarily order capitalists to enter into contracts against their will. That is worse than idle talk. It is useless to discuss the constitutionality of the question. It is impossible for the exact question ever to get before the Supreme Court. If it could, I am sure that court would decide that the Government, having the power either to object or consent, when it professes to consent must be held to consent. Afterwards if a condition of that consent be held to be unconstitutional or void, the condition will be set aside and not the consent, because it will be presumed to have been the intention of the Government to consent, and the duty and burden was on the Government to prescribe a valid and reasonable condition.

There is little doubt that if capital enters into a contract the contract would be complied with unless bankruptcy prevents, for capital does not seek a lawsuit nor, in the presence of so many opportunities for profitable investment, will it enter a precarious field. Before capital will go into this development it will want to know what it can rely on. If the conditions are laid down at the start, certain and clear, then the capitalist, understanding what is before him, may intelligently enter into the contract or refuse to do so. If the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky provided for fixing charges at the time of the approval of the specifications capital might be secured, but with an indeterminate scale, adjustable at the will of the Government, as he proposes, the proposition will be too uncertain to attract investment.

Two years ago, in order to secure action, Secretary Stimson and I agreed on some amendments to the general dam act and the application of those amendments to all pending projects. That was agreed to by all interested gentlemen in the House whom I could see, and I mailed a copy of the agreement to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who, not going to his office for his mail before coming to the House and not being advised of the agreement, objected to unanimous consent for consideration of the bills. Afterwards, when he understood the situation, he undertook to withdraw his objection, but it was too late and the bills failed. In that agreement, however, we did not agree to a general tax, as proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], but provided merely for payments to be expended in promoting and maintaining the navigability of that stream, but the charge was to be fixed certain at the time. So far as I am concerned, I would have agreed to that at any time, but other Members since that time refused to concur even in that.

I have always agreed with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the general dam act as originally passed, which I originated but which he perfected, reported out, and passed, was in itself all-sufficient for the purposes intended. Its terms would, in his judgment and mine, permit everything that the Sherley amendment would permit; but when President Roosevelt quit signing the bills passed under it and it began to be insisted that specific terms be placed in every special bill, the object of that bill to secure uniformity and simplicity was defeated, and by agreement between the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and Mr. Roosevelt the amendment of 1910 was made.

The Savannah River authorization, referred to by the gentleman from Illinois as now completed, was a renewal. It is, as I remember, one of the only three dams ever constructed under the dam act, original or amended. The gentleman is also mistaken in stating that all projects authorized have been financed and completed. That is, however, possibly not the fault of the general dam act, but of the agitation about it. When progress under it was barred by the Executive and others and demand made for Federal taxation and more stringent terms, I immediately began to insist on the provisions for uniformity now contained in section 13 of the present bill; that the new conditions proposed should be made to apply to the dams already constructed; that the same conditions should apply both to the new and old structures alike. However, after the amendment of 1910, and even before that, after President Taft's inauguration, applications for consent continued to come in, and 19 in all, I think, were signed, including renewals, before President Taft changed his policy and adopted the Federal taxation idea. As I remember, only three dams were constructed since the act of 1906 was passed. All of those which have been criticized were constructed under special acts passed prior to that. When President Taft changed his policy, of course we quit reporting bills and addressed our efforts to trying to discover and utilize whatever terms could be agreed upon with the executive department. It little concerns me what particular details are in a bill, so developments are had and the public interests are protected. Of course men differ as to what the public interests may be. I think it is to the interest of the public to have three or four thousand miles of navigation on our principal rivers without incurring fifty or a hundred millions of dollars of expense in building dams and locks.

It is growing more difficult every year to secure the passage of river and harbor bills. There are people in opposition to river and harbor legislation who denounce as graft and pork barrels the most perfect bills the River and Harbor Committees can construct. In view of that fact, the necessity appears all the greater to utilize private capital to perfect that work without expense to the Government, but I do not see any graft in that. I think the contribution of fifty or a hundred millions of dollars to the improvement of several thousand miles of rivers is some compensation to the Government. It is true that the water power is valuable. If it were not valuable projects would not be attractive to capital, and the benefits to the people consist in the development of the country through the development of hydroelectric power, light, fuel, motive power for cars and manufacturing, which, if properly encouraged, would revolutionize the condition of the people and immeasurably improve their prosperity. Their interests are perfectly protected by this bill, because it provides that if the State in which the electricity is to be used fails in its duty properly to regulate the charges and practices of the company, the Secretary of War shall then do so. There is a great difference between the situation considered by the critics of this bill as advocated by them on the public lands and the conditions covered by this bill. In their case the land in the stream and out of the stream belongs to the Government. The Government is owner of the land and sovereign of the country. It can fix conditions both as sovereign and landowner, and I have no criticism of methods suggested by gentlemen as applicable to that condition, but in cases to which this bill applies the Government owns nothing except where it buys land, pays for what is overflowed, and becomes the owner as well as the sovereign, just as it did in the Chandler-Dunbar case. There is nothing new in that case. The holding that the Government is paramount in the bed of a navigable stream and that anybody who owns the land, whether individual or a State, owns it with notice that the right of navigation is paramount, and whatever rights are held or claimed must be subordinated whenever the Government chooses to exercise it, is both old and sound. So it is unnecessary to discuss whether the State or individual owns the adjoining land and the bed of the stream, for it is immaterial. The Federal Government has a paramount right in the bed of the stream for navigation, and for navigation only We know that no person, natural or artificial, can oostruct the bed of the stream without the consent of Congress, and it has long since been provided that if any obstruction is put in the bed of the stream without the consent of Congress it is a crime, and in addition to punishment the Government can have it removed, but it is equally certain that the Government has no paramount easement or ownership outside the bed of the stream. If a dam backs up water enough to make a large reservoir, the Government must pay for the land. Then, having become the owner and the financier of the development, the Government can use the installation as it chooses, and as owner it can sell or lease or do anything it pleases that any other constructor or owner can do. Therefore, we have provided in section 14 of the bill, in strict accordance with the Chandler-Dunbar case, that the Secretary of War may lease any water at any Government construction not needed for navigation. Now, in case the Government proposes to consent for private capital to construct these dams and locks, that capital must buy and pay for all these overflowed lands and everything else.

The Government pays for nothing and owns nothing except the lock that is constructed as one of its conditions. The lock must be operated free of cost to the Government, so with that uncertainty as to that residue of water and with that irregularity the power company may use the water. Owing to the paramount control by the Government of the level of the lake the profits of the enterprise are very much reduced in amount or certainty and makes the proposition for a contract much more difficult of acceptance.

Now, I believe I have made myself understood to those who have taken the trouble to follow. Having postponed all efforts to amend the general dam act until the incoming of the present administration we immediately took up the subject with this administration. Secretary of War Garrison, while agreeing with the proposition that it was entirely constitutional to include in the contract the payment of a tax, did not believe it a wise policy. He thought that improvement would be more rapid and the States would be more prosperous without detriment to the General Government, if the regulation of practices and rates as well as taxation were left to the States, but he agreed with us that if a State should fail to make proper regulation the Secretary of War should do so. There can be no safer nor more perfect guarantee of regulation than that. The only practical difference between that and the corresponding proposition in the Ferris bill is that a different Secretary enforces it. Notwithstanding the violent denunciation of some extravagant gentlemen, the interests both of the Government and the people are absolutely protected in this bill, and a reasonable prospect is left to secure contracts and progress. My greatest objection to the Sherley amendment is that it means no progress, and if such extreme views are to be insisted upon, in my judgment it is useless to try to proceed with the legislation. I am perfectly willing to reason with gentlemen and try to agree with those who are willing to have progress and who can see the difference between the Government as a sovereign only, and the Government as both sovereign and owner of riparian interests, or the difference between the Government selling and leasing land and water power untrammeled and unreduced in value by the demands of navigation on the one hand, and a contract on the other to secure private capital to promote continuous navigation for the Government in consideration of a consent to a remainder interest only in the use of the surplus water for hydroelectric purposes.

I would like to say to those who seek to disparage the President, in their criticisms of this bill, that this question of taxation was never taken up with the President at all. Neither was it taken up at any of our conferences. I thought that all those who challenged the bill were represented in these conferences and that all differences were agreed upon in the agreement reached. If the gentlemen who are insisting upon the Sherley amendment had submitted that question in the conferences, an agreement might have been reached as to that which would have supplied some provision favorable to development, while at the same time protecting the interests of the Government and the people. What the President's attitude would have been I am unable to say. Probably he would have agreed with Secretary Garrison that while we have the power to impose a tax it would not be the best policy to do so, especially as all the people in those parts of the country most interested and where the greatest development under the bill is expected were fearful that Federal taxation would prevent development, and preferred to leave that as one of the sources of State taxation and support and that private capital might be had in aid of navigation.

Some acrimonious complaint has been made about the character of the hearings before the committee in the consideration of this bill. It should be remembered that for 10 years there has been no dearth of literature on this subject. The press has teemed with opposition to the plan and scheme contemplated by the general dam act. The advocates of that legislation have in turn not been remiss in their efforts to furnish information as to their view of the case. In addition to that the National Waterways Commission has exhaustively considered and reported on the question. The committee saw no necessity for general hearings, as the rival camps were fully entrenched and each thought itself fully informed; each at least felt advised as to its own position and believed it understood the attitude of the other party.

The thing needed was not more information, but some accommodation or reconciliation of the conflicting demands so as to permit action. The former two administrations had vacillated on the question, each finally refusing to sign bills without certain drastic conditions. Our effort was to ascertain just what demands would be made as to conditions in order for bills to be signed by the present administration. We had never been able to make the so-called conservationists understand the modus operandi of financing and constructing these dams and appurtenant works, nor did the Secretary of War seem to understand the situation, the idea being that a few transmission lines to light a few towns or run a few trolley cars constituted the full scope and limit of hydroelectric utility. In order to present that feature of the case to the Secretary of War the subcommittee invited two of the most eminent water-power experts in the United States to appear before it, and a representative of the Secretary of War was present to hear the testimony. The difficulties in the way of securing capital made an impression on the Secretary of War, and it is to be regretted that they have not had a like effect upon gentlemen who, by their objections and amendments, are in reality, whether they so intend it or not, opposing this plan and obstructing progress.

As to the promotion of navigation free of cost to the Government through the development of electricity, I suggest if the Government were able and willing to expend countless millions in opening the shoally rivers it would first have to raise those millions by taxing the people; second, it would have to buy all the necessary land on and near those streams for appurtenant works and backwater, removing all of that property from taxation by the State entirely. So that in order to erect the improvement it must take that much money away from the people and invest it in property that, no matter how valuable it might otherwise be, is exempt from taxation; then the people would have the navigation only and be out all the expense and be bereft of that resource for revenue. If the Government consents for private capital to do that, the people are not taxed at all, there is no drain on the Treasury, the dam and lock would be erected and operated free, the Government has the navigation without cost, the people enjoy it without cost, and all the valuable appurtenant works are private property and may be taxed in the State and bring in revenue. That is as far as the contrast has practical application, because under this bill if the Government, in accordance with section 14, leases the water power the people may have the same character of hydroelectric service with the same regulation as that which could be furnished under private construction, in which case the appurtenant works, transmission lines, and power houses would all be subject to taxation by the State, but if the Government insists on imposing that charge or tax and the States should also insist upon it, all hope of development would end.

Whoever may be right or wrong in this contention the matter ought to be settled definitely right now if progress is to be had in the future. If centralists intend, in the event this Sherley amendment is defeated, to insist on it every time a special bill for consent is presented, there can be no progress. Unless that theory is to be abandoned definitely and finally it is better to put it in the bill right now and try it out. If it proves a mistake we will save time by allowing experience to prove the mistake. Then with clearer ideas and opposition removed, we can renew the effort to secure fair legislation that will promote the development and prosperity of the country.

Strictures have been indulged during this debate on the administration's alleged connection with the pending bill, as well as the so-called domination of Congress by the President and our servile allegiance to Executive dictation. The authors of these strictures must be unfamiliar with the history of relations between the White House and Congress during the last two administrations. Both jurisprudence and legislation recognize a potent principle called custom, which by immemorial usage ripens into a sort of prescriptive authority. The precedents established by recent administrations were so bad that I chafed under them while they were growing up. I felt very much then about the practice as these eloquently complaining gentlemen claim to feel now. Who can forget the autocratic control of President Roosevelt when he outlawed Mr. Tawney, of Minnesota, by his arbitrary dictation, and drove Mr. Wadsworth, of New York, to frenzy and subjection about meat inspection? Sometimes his messages were so fast and furious as to suggest nothing short of the perpetual fire of a gatling gun. A striking instance of Executive dictation occurred when President Taft sent duplicate commerce bills to both Houses and ordered both to go to work simultaneously and pass them.

Two cases in point are the subject of the pending bill, and the Panama tolls exemption referred to in this debate. The exemption of tolls could never have been grafted as an amendment on the Panama Canal act without the previous urgent support of Presidents Taft and Roosevelt. Their utterances were quoted and sent back to us as the basis of argument by the lobbyist. Likewise the same two Presidents, by their vacillation and obstructive interference with Congress, prevented progress under the general dam act. Is it strange that having become accustomed to Executive counsel when unwisely uttered we should continue to consider it under the administration of a better and wiser President?

As under the domination of Presidents Taft and Roosevelt "we sinned and fell short" of our lawful duty in these two particulars, so under the guidance and intelligent counsel of a better President, Woodrow Wilson, the best since Jefferson, we are getting back to the practice of right and duty that our country may resume its course of prosperity and glory. We have under his leadership and advice restored honesty and equality in the canal management, and resumed our honorable and glorious position among the nations. Likewise, the President is wisely helping us to reach proper conclusions as to the development and utilization of water resources to the end that the people may prosper in the enjoyment of navigation and all the advantages which hydroelectricity can contribute to their wealth and happiness. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I desire to thank you all for your attention, and say that during these remarks there has been the best attention and order I ever saw in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARKLEY). The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 12 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I direct my remarks to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has correctly stated that water powers are developed at places where there are waterfalls or rapids, or both. Water-power sites do not exist everywhere. Some States have none of sufficient importance to be worth while mentioning. I believe that the localities where the water powers are should exclusively exercise the taxing power, but I do not believe in exempting the water powers from being properly taxed. If they are not so taxed by the local authorities, then I favor a Federal charge. My colleague [Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota] is undoubtedly as well informed as any Member on the question of legal powers of the United States to charge for the running waters in streams. He has a great fund of information upon this as well as on many other problems considered in the House. His statement of the law is unquestionably correct when he says that the Federal Government has no legal or constitutional power to levy a tax for the use of the running waters. Mr. UNDERWOOD and others state the same thing. They derive their positive information from decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

If we were seeking to enact a law to charge the owners of existing dams for the running waters, we would squarely meet with the constitutional objection referred to. But that is not what we seek to do. We are trying to make rules by authority of which dams may be constructed in the future, and as a condition for the United States, consent to private parties obstructing the streams with dams the consent may be coupled with a charge, which is neither immoral nor impossible because of the constitutional inhibition before referred to. The United States can couple its consent with the charge referred to by adopting the amendment.

Whether the principle of the amendment will be important or not can hardly be determined at this time, but it is exceedingly important to preserve the principle until it shall be determined. We should resolve the doubt in favor of the public.

That there should be provisions for the growing necessities of the general public in addition to those contained in the draft as the bill stands now seems to me to be imperative. Once the consent has been given for the construction of a dam under the terms of this bill, it becomes a binding contract with the Government, and, except for breach by the dam owners, the public would be tied to the conditions at least for 53 years.

Fifty-three years is a long time when measured on the basis of the lives of men and women, and conditions will change very much and new necessities arise. Before the expiration of any claim that would grow out of this act we shall all be at least 53 years older, and the United States will have a population of approximately 300,000,000. Some sections of our country can take an additional population without being overcrowded, but to increase the whole population three times its present number would, under the present social system, create distressing congestion. The country is well adapted to support several times its present population in a far more prosperous manner than we now do, but our social system would have to be materially changed in order to do it. We have not felt the crowding in growth up to the present time, as we will feel it in the future. At all times we have had somewhere to go. When we found the congestion too great in any particular locality there were other localities to go to that were not so congested. To accommodate the growing population is primarily a problem of adjustment, but we can not adjust satisfactorily to a larger population on the present social and economic basis. In fact, we are not adjusting satisfactorily now. We are having trouble in many ways. The strain is getting tighter as the elbowroom decreases. We can not go on indefinitely with present practices. The men and women who are doing the work of the world are not enjoying the advantages due them. They know it and can not be fooled much longer. As legislators we should safeguard the future. It may be difficult to do that and at the same time secure the development by private enterprise of the water powers that the public now calls for; but the importance of it is more to be considered than the difficulty.

There is not yet a strong enough demand by the public for public ownership to secure the development of the water powers by the public for the public. Whatever the public now demands must be supplied by private enterprise. Private development can be secured only by tempting it with the promise of a premium; that is, profit. No private action will be taken without the prospect of profit, a profit sufficient to overcome all the risks. The public is forced to pay for that. It must grant the opportunity for profit if it expects the development of water powers by private enterprise.

Every uncertainty or doubt that may be incorporated into this act affecting the investment of capital, before capital will make a venture, will be resolved by capital into its greatest risk, and in the calculation of the cost of a production plant and dividend returns the estimate will include the risks, and the service to be performed will be charged with it. For that reason I consider the terms of the Sherley amendment less wise because of its uncertainty as to the amount of the charge than the principle involved in a charge. We can make laws now to regulate capital after the investments have been made, but we can not compel the initial investment. In order to get jurisdiction of specific capital the initial investment must be made. All the uncertainties and risks are calculated first by those contemplating it, and if they are too hazardous capital will not invest to give us jurisdiction. Once it enters into the enterprise it is at our mercy to the extent of our power over it. Some general principles should be calculated in connection with this amendment.

The period of unrestricted individualism in business of every character that concerns the general public may be practically at an end. If it is, the principle of the amendment is not very material. But there are three lines of thought upon this—first, those who believe in unrestricted individualism and who claim that competition should control prices; second, those who believe in private ownership, but in Government regulation of all business in which the public is concerned; and, third, those who believe in Government ownership and that the Government should do all the business in which the public is interested. In each of these schools of thought, if I may call them schools, there are many respectable adherents. Whatever our individual opinions may be upon either of the three contentions we have no right to foreclose the public of the privilege of taking which it pleases. We should safeguard the public by unblocking every avenue that it may seek to travel as well as provide for its growing necessities.

I think the amendment proposed by Mr. SHERLEY right in principle in view of the uncertainties of the future, but I believe the proposed amendment itself should be made more definite in the proposed change, and therefore I offer an amendment to it in order to make it read as follows:

The Secretary of War shall provide as a condition of such approval for the annual payment to the United States of a sum equal to 5 per cent of the net profits, for the benefit that shall accrue to the grantee under this act: Provided, however, That when it shall be made to appear that the local authorities collect from such grantee for State, county, municipal, or other purposes not related to the Federal Government, a tax which is not a special tax, the Secretary of War shall deduct from the amount to be collected by him such sum or sums paid to the local authorities not exceeding 5 per cent per annum.

The amendment that I offer preserves the principle and reduces itself to a certainty on which capital can calculate. I do not believe that capital would venture under the first amendment because of there being no limit to the charge which could be made. It has been repeatedly stated that the Secretary of War would be reasonable, but capitalists do not figure on what seems reasonable to others than themselves. They take no chances that they do not figure on charging the public with.

As the population increases and the difficulties multiply, as they will under our social system, the public will conclude that a great deal of the work now done to supply public demands must be done by the public itself, and that will be discovered long before the end of 53 years. Therefore we confront the problem here of offering a premium to private enterprise and at the same time saving to the public the opportunity to do these things which it may wish to do in the future.

These water powers should at all times be in a position to be recaptured by the public. My colleague [Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota], in response to a question, has stated that the Government may take by condemnation at any time any dams that may be constructed. I think that is true, but it may be claimed by the owners, once the consent has been given for the construction of a dam under the terms of this bill, that it becomes a binding contract, and except for a breach by the dam owners the public will be bound for 53 years unless some public necessity should arise that is not contemplated by the terms of the original grant. For that reason I have drafted and shall offer as additional to section 9 the following proposed amendment which will relieve the problem of doubt as to the amount of the charge and dispose of any possible dispute as to the right of the public to acquire. The amendment that I shall propose is as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this section or this act shall estop the United States, or any State or municipality within which any dam may be situated, from acquiring by condemnation or purchase any of the rights or properties secured by any grantee, association, or individual by authority of this act, as well as all the property of every character developed or created in connection with the reasonable operation of any dam: And provided further, That if such rights and properties are condemned or secured by a State or municipality the same shall not in any way release such State or municipality from the obligations imposed in favor of the United States upon any grantee under any of the provisions of this act.

In less than 50 years it is probable that the water powers will be taken over by the public, whether we incorporate the amendment into this act or not, because one generation has not the right to unnecessarily encumber another. But unless we provide for the acquisition to be accomplished in an orderly way there will be trouble, and some hardship and injustice would occur that it is our duty to prevent. The responsibility rests on us as legislators to anticipate the needs of the future. When we legislate and provide for the administration of public affairs, with only the present demands considered, we are sure to provide trouble for people in the future. A mere reference to the acts of those who have administered governmental affairs in the past is a most painful reminder of that fact.

Immense areas of the public domain were granted to the railways free; the vast mineral deposits were permitted to get into the control of private interests; most valuable patents and inventions were allowed to become licensed monopolies; the control of the money system itself—the means of exchange—has been made a licensed monopoly; and so on we could list all of the most useful agencies that serve mankind and find them so controlled and monopolized that they have made industrial slaves of men and women, and now we are about to add water powers to private control for another of the toll collectors from the toiling millions.

This bill would have been all right to have passed 50 years ago, but it will not, unless materially amended, meet the demands of the next 50 years. Still it will be passed, because the public wants a dam act, and since we can not get a good act, because things are not yet staged for that, let us remove one of the embarrassments that is sure to arise by adopting the amendments I propose. We have got to give a premium, to be paid by the public, if private enterprise is to develop water powers, but we can safeguard the public by providing that upon payment of a reasonable premium we may take over the water powers. [Applause.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman has already answered in his argument the question I wished to ask.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDBERGH. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think that the rapid development of means of utilizing this power and the means of transmitting it, which has gone on in recent years and is likely to be marvelously increased in the future, renders an amendment which may be offered very broad in scope? Can you limit it?

Mr. LINDBERGH. You have got to limit, that is, fix the charge, in order to induce capital to invest. You can not get capital to enter upon an uncertainty. The effect of providing uncertainties is to prevent capital going into an enterprise until something certain is agreed upon. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment that I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman does not have to lose the time in which his amendment is read.

Mr. LINDBERGH. The principal point I wish to make in this discussion is in favor of the local authorities to receive the income, or whatever tax is levied. I do not believe that the General Government should enter into a policy of collecting taxes upon local improvements, as I have shown in my argument before. I do believe, however, that there should be a tax collected upon these improvements, and that it should be safeguarded in whatever bill we pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Was the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota reported?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it has not yet been reported.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment reported. I understood the gentleman to offer it.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Sherley amendment so as to make it read as follows:

"The Secretary of War shall provide, as a condition of such approval, for the annual payment to the United States of a sum equal to 5 per cent of the net profits for the benefit that shall accrue to the grantee under this act: Provided, That when it shall be made to appear that the local authorities collect from such grantee, for State, county, municipal, or other purposes, a tax which is not a special tax, the Secretary of War shall deduct from the amount to be collected by him such sum or sums paid to the local authorities not exceeding 5 per cent per annum."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that that is an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I offer it as a substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see now if we can not reach some agreement in respect to time for debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there are requests for an hour and three minutes of time on this side of the aisle. I think we could cut that down to one hour.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have requests on this side of the aisle for 45 minutes, and if the gentleman can take the same amount I will ask that debate be limited to an hour and a half.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think that would be unfair to those gentlemen who have made requests for time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Are the requests made by gentlemen who are all in favor of the amendment or against it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They are on both sides. We must have an hour.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, we will make it an hour a side.

Mr. MURDOCK. That will bring it to a quarter after 5, and we will have to have a quorum then if we take the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be closed at the end of two hours' time, to be controlled one half by the gentleman from Minnesota and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I want any more time for debate, but I think that the debate ought to be divided equally between those for and against the amendment. I should like to have five minutes in which to conclude the debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman must recollect that his side of the amendment is far ahead of ours in time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. That statement has been made several times, but I do not think the record will bear it out.

Mr. MANN. Under this request the gentlemen who have indicated a desire to speak will have plenty of time, because the gentleman from Georgia has 15 minutes extra.

Mr. MURDOCK. That does not shut off amendments.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That must include all amendments. Several gentlemen have amendments to offer.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. I want the debate to close inside of two hours.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I understood the request to be that all debate be closed on this amendment, and that is the way the Chair put it, but as I understand it now the gentleman desires to have all debate closed on the section.

Mr. ADAMSON. That will not shut off the opportunity to offer amendments, but I desire to end the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia request that all debate be limited to two hours upon the Sherley amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; all debate on the section and amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] has just stated that under a misapprehension he did not ask any time, but if this closes debate on the section he does desire to have five minutes' time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then we will make it 2 hours and 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to 2 hours and 10 minutes, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment myself that I desire to offer, and I desire to have a little time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think we can save five minutes for the gentleman; and if not, then I will ask unanimous consent that he may have that time.

Mr. FOWLER. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will do my best to accommodate the gentleman; and if I fail, I will ask unanimous consent that he may have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes, or so much thereof as the gentleman may desire to use, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the very clever discussion challenging the right of the Government to require the payment of money by private concerns for the use of power generated by moving water in navigable streams.

It is argued that the Government does not own the water, and yet attempts to collect a tax from it, or for the use of it, or, as one gentleman stated it, the Government is trying to sell something it does not own.

It is not accurate to designate as taxes the money paid to the Government by a hydroelectric company for the privilege of utilizing the energy of falling water in a navigable stream. The right of the Government to collect money for the pasturage use of forest reserves or of public lands will not be denied, but money so received can hardly be called taxes. I do not claim that the analogy between public lands and water rights is complete or that the Government owns the one in the same way it owns the other. Indeed it is difficult to find a case exactly parallel to the present one.

In the arguments made the word "taxes" is used in a rather confusing way. It is said the Government can collect taxes from the citizen only when it acts in its sovereign capacity; that when it leases water rights or when it contracts to get money for the development of hydroelectric energy it is acting not in its sovereign capacity, but in a private capacity, and therefore has no right to levy or collect taxes in that capacity.

The fallacy lies in calling such money taxes. It is not taxes any more than the pasture rent is taxes. But whether the Government is in such case acting in its sovereign capacity or in some other capacity is not the controlling question. The question of public policy involved is of greater moment.

It seems to me the logic of the gentlemen who argue that the Government can not do this carries them too far. They say the Government can collect taxes from a citizen only in the exercise of its sovereign power. They further say this money is a tax, and that it is not collected by virtue of the sovereign power, therefore it can not be lawfully collected at all.

If we accept this view, the inevitable result is that the Government is helpless in the premises, and must either prohibit the utilization of water in navigable streams for developing hydroelectric energy altogether or else sit idly by while private concerns get possession of these immense opportunities in perpetuity. The argument which leads to such an absurd conclusion is necessarily unsound. To admit either alternative as a solution of the problem is absurd and impossible, and no refinement of reasoning can make it otherwise.

I insist that the public good demands that all water-power opportunities not already captured by private interests must remain the perpetual property of the American people, and if no present way can be found to develop them without allowing them to pass into private ownership, then, for one, I say let them remain undeveloped till such a way is found. Not one additional franchise should be given till some provision is made for preventing their monopolization or consolidation in private hands, otherwise they are certain to become the foundation of a trust so powerful as to make all other trusts seem insignificant. If developed at all it must be under strict governmental control, and under conditions which will carefully safeguard the rights and interests of the people to be served by them.

One of the pioneers in conservation and in the value of water power as a national resource, Dr. W. J. McGee, said, in 1909, relative to hydroelectric energy:

> The 37,000,000 horsepower to-day available exceeds our entire mechanical power now in use, and would operate every mill, drive every spindle, propel every train and boat, and light every city, town, and village in the country.

Surely we can not deal with such a question in the narrow, shortsighted spirit of insisting that every legal "i" shall be dotted and every constitutional "t" crossed.

I think a good deal of confusion in dealing with the subject arises from too much looking backward. We lawyers are very apt, perhaps too apt, to look back to see what the precedents are—to see what somebody did or said in the past on a similar matter. I do not belittle that tendency in the lawyers. It is all right in its way; but this is a case where looking back too much is more likely to confuse than enlighten.

The past sheds little or no light on this subject. Ten years ago hydroelectric energy was practically unheard of. We knew little or nothing about it. How, then, are decisions rendered at that time going to serve as a guide at this time in this matter—a matter of which the court then knew nothing? What is to be gained by groping in the dark in that fashion?

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] made a most ingenious argument against the conclusions of the Supreme Court in the Chandler-Dunbar case, and seems to think that the opinion in that case is not a very sound one as measured by the precedents. But the precedents he would measure it by were written at a time when no one dreamed that falling water could be utilized to develop electric energy.

The Chandler-Dunbar case is the only one which has been decided in the light of the facts now before us. Would the distinguished gentleman from Virginia have us repudiate a unanimous opinion written in the light of full knowledge of the conditions affected and follow other decisions not involving this very question, and written when the court had no knowledge of the most material facts and conditions involved in it? Surely on second thought he would not do that.

The Chandler-Dunbar case is the John the Baptist of the law in regard to hydroelectric matters. It is the forerunner of a line of cases which must and will follow its doctrine, and it is not only the sound but the absolutely necessary view of the matter, if we are to continue to have government of the people rather than government by a water-power trust. There is wrapped up in this matter a question bigger than one of mere precedents, and that is the great, the paramount question of a sound public policy on a very vital matter.

Shall we adopt the policy of allowing private concerns to get and to hold in perpetuity the almost incredible opportunities for developing energy furnished by nature? Shall we surrender to a favored few the great and beneficial results which should accrue, as far as practicable, to the benefit of all? Shall we part with this birthright of the American people in order to conform to supposed precedents which have little or no application?

That would be too big a price to pay. This is really a matter which precedents do not reach. It is a new matter and should be dealt with as such. Have we not the capacity to deal with it in a new way, or are we bound to follow old ways which do not fit the case at all?

The business of developing hydroelectric energy is bound to become a basic industry on which very many other industries must depend.

Nearly every article of manufacture is bound in the end to be connected with, and more or less dependent on hydroelectric energy.

If we turn these water-power opportunities over to private interests, we give them the power to exploit the consuming public in such a way and to such an extent as never occurred before.

To give private interests the power to harness nature and make her work for them and for them alone would be to commit a very serious blunder, and to use the Constitution as a pretext for such a course would be adding insult to injury.

We have now reached the forks in the road. This bill as it stands leads to the camp of those who would enthrone privilege, who would give to a favored few the untold possibilities which lie in the control of water-power sites, of hydroelectric opportunities. Do not take that road. Let us take the other road leading to the good old Jeffersonian camp of fair and equal opportunity to all. Let us see to it at the very outset that these great natural opportunities are saved and dedicated forever to the use of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Heretofore I have not been inclined to favor the imposition of a rental charge or royalty by the Federal Government in making water-power grants, because I fear the outcome of such a policy would impose an unfair charge on the consumer.

The people of my district get light and power, in a large measure, from hydroelectric development; therefore, I would naturally be opposed to any provision which would levy an extra Federal tax upon the consumer because of the fortunate situation of the people of that community as to water power.

But, after listening to the able arguments made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], and the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER and Mr. RAINEY], as well as others, I am convinced that there is a principle involved in this proposed amendment which reaches beyond the question of local expediency. I am still of the opinion that in the vast majority of projects a royalty charge would be unfair and inexpedient; nevertheless, I am forced to agree with the gentlemen named that cases may arise where the best method of giving the public a share of the benefits of water power granted to private interests would be by causing such companies to divide the excess profits with the public through a rental charge. Therefore it is my judgment that this bill should recognize the right and power in the Government to impose such charge and to exercise that right only in exceptional cases, to wit, where there is no other feasible way of permitting the people to share in the profits of the water power.

It has been argued by the opponents of the pending bill that the charge of such royalty would be unconstitutional because it is a tax. However, they contend that Congress has the constitutional power to refuse or permit the construction of a dam in a navigable river. Granting, as I do, that they are correct in this statement that Congress has power to grant a permit, will not the authority that enables them to permit or refuse such a grant also include the lesser power to construct, on such terms as Congress may see fit to exact, such as a charge for the use of the privilege granted?

For example, in the city of St. Paul the municipal ordinance granting the use of the city streets to the electric railway provides for an advance payment of $10 per car per annum for each and every car moved on the streets of the city of St. Paul. In Minneapolis this rental is $25 per car for the average number of cars moved in a year. These franchise rentals are not taxes. The Twin City Rapid Transit Co., which is the holding and operating company of the St. Paul City Railway and the Minneapolis Street Railway Co., which received the original charter ordinances, pays all real and personal property taxes just the same.

Indeed, in addition to taxes on all tangible property, the company pays a tax on the excess valuation of its capital stock amounting to $12,000,000 or more, and, in addition thereto, pays a gross-earnings tax on its suburban business, the same as any railroad company in Minnesota. The $10 per car in St. Paul and the $25 per average number of cars used in Minneapolis, as provided in the charter ordinances, is not considered by the company or the citizens as a tax, or having anything to do with that subject. The company, as I understand it, looks upon these car-license charges or rentals as the consideration in its charter which gives the municipal ordinances the force of contracts.

These companies accept these charter considerations as a part of the terms of their franchises, just as such royalties would be accepted by hydroelectric grantees as a part of their water-power grants and as partial consideration therefor.

The supporters of this bill have also contended that the power of Congress over navigable rivers relates to navigation only. If the power of Congress relates to "navigation only," Congress would have no constitutional authority to pass a water-power law. But the courts, as I read the cases, set the control of Congress over these streams as to navigation and other purposes "incidental thereto." This additional phrase is vital, because it is through this "incidental" use and purpose that Congress exercises its jurisdiction over water powers. And in naming the terms and conditions for such use Congress may constitutionally exercise its prerogative to exact a franchise rental as a part of the consideration for the grant. This power Congress should not relinquish in this bill, although it may not often deem it wise to exact the rental for fear of taxing the consumer.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes, or so much thereof as he desires, to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

[Mr. BURNETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and insert the following:

"The Secretary of War may provide as a part of the conditions and stipulations of such approval for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits which accrue to the grantee through authority given under this act. At the end of 25 years the Secretary of War may readjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable: Provided, however, That no charge made under this act shall be such as to deprive the grantee of a reasonable return upon the actual investment of the grantee in any project constructed and operating under the provisions of this act, including cost of maintenance, renewal, and depreciation charges."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved against the amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the time provided for in the Sherley amendment, namely, readjustment of the charges at the end of 20 years and then two subsequent periods of 10 years, or three periods of 10 years, as the case may be, is altogether too short. If we are to interest capital in the development of hydroelectric water powers, we must have a period of time sufficient for a fair return to be found for the investment. There is ample law on the statute books now under the general dam act if we do not want to use the water at all. I for one want to see the water that is being aimlessly and wastefully allowed to flow away to-day made use of; and unless the Government intends to assume the whole expense of the general development, I for one can see no way in which that can be avoided unless we offer a sufficiently attractive proposition for investors.

The principle may be right and proper that there should be some form of return to the Federal Government; but do not let us put too much power in the hands of one official nor allow that power to be exercised too frequently, making it absolutely uncertain what result there may be for private capital.

It has been stated here time and time again that no return under the original act is to be given to the Federal Government. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] demonstrated very clearly that the locks which will be insisted upon in navigable streams represent an additional 50 per cent of the cost of the dam. I submit that that alone is a tax upon the constructing permit. We ought to give some allowance for that feature of the case and not make the terms so hard to the constructing company as to be practically prohibitive; so that I ask that there be at least that period of rest, an opportunity for the investing company to secure a sufficient length of time under which its securities may be made attractive to the investing public.

I speak of this, as I stated to the House before, solely from the standpoint of one interested in navigation. The typical case that has been brought before the House in previous Congresses is in my district, and, as it stands, that power is practically idle to-day, and will continue to be idle; so that I ask that the House stray not too far away from the original bill as proposed by the committee. But if this principle of Federal taxation is recognized, which I think it is likely to be, then make it on a sane basis, so that the investing public, as I say, may have some return for the tax which will be placed upon it by the Federal Government. Let us conserve our natural resources by making such use of them as the opportunities offer. We want it possible to secure navigation upon the Connecticut River under proper conditions and restrictions.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, we have all talked a good deal about regulation. We want regulation. For some reason regulation has not been satisfactory in the past. We are trying to regulate the railroads. We are trying to regulate different forms of industry, and we have not been satisfied. We have not obtained the results that we wanted to obtain.

A few days ago I was looking over the New Freedom, by President Wilson. It is a compilation principally of campaign speeches by the President when he was a candidate in the last presidential election, and he attacked the idea of regulating monopoly. He proposed to do away with monopoly, to absolutely put monopoly out of business. That was his idea and that was his plan. He was criticizing the Progressive Party, claiming it stood for regulated monopoly. To-day we are considering a problem which, according to the leaders in this House and according to the authorities all over the country, partakes of a monopoly. It is to a certain extent a monopoly. There can not be competition in the construction of these dams within given localities, so that the matter of regulation becomes more essential and more important here than in ordinary cases. Nobody talks here about destroying, but they bring in an administration bill so weak and lame as to regulation that a Progressive would not give it a friendly look.

We have had rules of legislation and laws on the statute book for fixing rates, but it seems we have not been able to get at the problem in some way or other. We have not had power enough to compel a division of the profits, or to compel a price low enough that the people may use the utility and divide up among themselves the surpluses afforded.

The other day it was suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that an organization down in his neighborhood had made a tremendous reduction in the rate, had reduced the rate to the people in one particular municipality from 16 cents per kilowatt hour to 12 cents per kilowatt hour. Yet the record of the cost of production of this current will show that it costs less than 1 cent to produce it. It costs less than 1 cent per kilowatt hour and they sell it for 16 cents until public sentiment compels a reduction. The Navy in the several navy yards of the country has entered into contracts for the purchase of this current, and they get it at an average of about 1 cent per kilowatt hour, and I understand that at Rock Island they make it at the Rock Island Arsenal for 3 mills per kilowatt hour. Yet such a tremendous reduction as that from 16 to 12 cents per kilowatt hour is called to our attention and cited as an argument in favor of giving our water power away to these favored few.

If we are going to let this water power go into the hands of parties to be utilized we propose to see to it that the difference between the cost and the selling price is not so great, and that the public will share in the benefits from the economy in the production of electricity by water power. If we consider the policy of the Government in developing the coal lands of the country we will see that we have not derived any benefit from them. We got rid of the coal lands in Pennsylvania. They have gotten into private hands, and now they are owned by a few railroads, and the price of coal has been put up from time to time.

If these same parties can get hold of the water powers of the country what is to prevent them from further raising the price of coal? If we retain an effective regulation, if we retain the ownership of these water powers in the Government of the United States, we will be able to put electric current into competition with coal. We will be able to reduce the price of coal. We will be able to take care of the people of the country. And so that is the reason why some of us here favor a charge by the Government. We do not care at the outset what the price is, but we want to be able effectively to take possession of the monopoly and reduce the price to the consumer when the price is too high. I believe the Government should own, not regulate, a monopoly, and this permit or lease for a reasonable charge for a definite term implies ownership.

The following resolution was adopted by the Fifth National Conservation Congress, which met here in Washington City recently:

Whereas concentrated monopolistic control of water power in private hands is swiftly increasing in the United States, and far more rapidly than public control thereof; and

Whereas this concentrating, if it is fostered, as in the past, by outright grants of public powers in perpetuity, will inevitably result in a highly monopolistic control of mechanical power, one of the bases of modern civilization, and a prime factor in the cost of living: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we recognize the firm and effective control of water-power corporations as a pressing and immediate necessity, urgently required in the public interest; that we recognize that there is no restraint so complete, effective, and permanent as that which comes from firmly retained ownership of the power site; that it is therefore the solemn judgment of the Fifth National Conservation Congress that hereafter no water power now owned or controlled by the public should be sold, granted, or given away in perpetuity, or in any manner removed from the public ownership, which alone can give sound basis of assured and permanent control in the interests of the people.

This bill has been pronounced an administration bill. I think the head of the administration has been ill advised. But one thing sure, this is too reactionary a bill to get the vote of any Progressive in the shape it is reported here, even in its amended form.

Regulation is said to be all right for the consumer. It is deemed all right to give some public-utility tribunal the right to say how much the current shall be sold at to the consumer, but we hesitate and have all kinds of qualms and fears when we come to allowing some public tribunal to say how much the charge shall be to the producer. The right to adjust the charge to the producer is called confiscation; but the other is excusable. We are not to object to regulating the price to the consumer, but when it comes to regulation of the charge to be paid by the producer there is a question of possible confiscation. Why is it necessary to pursue a different policy in one case than in the other? They say the right to fix a charge against the producer and to vary it would place the power in the hands of the Government officer to ruin the operator of the water-power plant; but how about 16 cents per kilowatt hour to the consumer? Such charges ruin the consumer, and there is no complaint.

My State of Washington is the third State of the Union in the production of electric energy by water power, and we find out there that the same corporations holding the water power, or the greater portion of it, in the State of Washington are holding water power in the State of Georgia and in New York and in Massachusetts. The interlocking of the directors and of the lines and of the plants manufacturing this electric current is such as to make it more and more a unified organization all over this country. Who are the men who are at the head of the water-power companies of the country? The General Electric Co., for instance; J. P. Morgan & Co., of the Morgan banking interests; the First National Bank of New York; the National Bank of Commerce, of New York; the Standard Trust Co., of New York; Drexel & Co., of Philadelphia; the Franklin National Bank, of Philadelphia; the Girard Trust Co., of Philadelphia. Those are the very identical men who have control of the railroads and of the coal.

We give away the timber in this way out in the West. We said that the best thing to do was to let the timber go; and what did we get out of it? The price of lumber has not been reduced; it has not caused timber to be sold to the mill at a cheaper price—not at all—but the faith and hope of the people, and the hope of posterity, lies in the United States forest reserves and in the timber that the Government still owns. If we ever are able to reduce the price it will be by that which we have held, and that which we are able to use in a legitimate way, but yet retain control of it.

The water power of the West is used in this way. We hear something about trouble sometimes, but we have plenty of utilized water power and plenty of applications for permits for water power on the public lands and in the rivers and waterfalls and rapids that are found on the public lands of the West, where the water power is. There is no occasion and no necessity for us to fall down at this particular time, and if we want really to control the water power of the country it is essential to do it with this amendment. If capital is a little slow we can wait. Of course, they will hurry if we will give them the Nation's valuable water power. Let us retain ownership. Give a permit only, and then reserve the right to charge the grantee what is right and fair for the privilege, revising the amount of the charge at intervals. I am for the Sherley amendment. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee informally rose; and Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, No. 158.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEPHENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield some time?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. A former Member of this Congress, Mr. Phillips, has written a most interesting book, and in the five minutes allotted to me I want to read a chapter from The Land and Labor, written by Mr. Phillips:

[From Land and Labor, by Phillips, one-time Member of Congress.]

"It is related that a certain eastern potentate fell into the impecunious condition common to many of his predecessors and all of his successors, and set his wits to work to devise a remedy. A farmer of imposts who had often aided him in this dilemma came to his rescue. He offered him 60,000 tomans for all the wind that should ever blow over Cashmere. The monarch at first affected to be staggered at the proposition. He was unable to find anything in precedents to warrant it; but, although a believer in the doctrine that whatever is is right, he was forced to admit that a monarchy may introduce useful innovations. Of course it was assumed that he was the supreme owner and disposer of all things in his dominions, not only for his own brief, erratic span of life, but for all time, and so he came to the conclusion that as everything in the world had been sold which could be sold there was no good reason why the winds, unstable though they might be, should be exempted if a purchaser could be found. After a proper amount of preliminary haggling a sale was made and the transaction legalized by all that signatures, seals, and parchment could do for it.

"Before the public had fairly got over laughing at the absurdity of this novel bargain the owner of the wind issued a proclamation forbidding all persons in Cashmere from using his wind to turn their windmills, winnow their corn, propel their vessels, or employ it in any other manner until they had first entered into agreements with him and obtained leases for the various localities, covenanting to pay certain amounts for the privilege. Then the laughing turned to lamentation. The monarch met the torrent of petitions and complaints by affecting to deplore the circumstances. He could not, of course, foresee all that had occurred, but his sacred word was involved. Rulers of that type are usually very particular about their sacred word. Driven to desperation, the inhabitants contributed the amount that had been paid for the wind and tendered it to their sovereign, so that this unheard of transaction could be canceled.

"The matter was not to be so easily arranged. The owner of the winds of Cashmere would not think of such a thing. He had acquired a vested right in them. Since it had become purchasable the wind had greatly risen, in price at least. Wind stocks were on an upward market. The owner insisted that his title was good. He did not claim it merely by his right of discovery of the commercial value of the wind, or that he had been the first to preempt this privilege, but he had fairly bought it from the representative of Government, and declared that his title was begirt and founded on all that was sacred in law or the theory of eminent domain and supreme authority. It would be altogether unfair to ask him to surrender this valuable privilege for anything less than what it might bring him in case he should be allowed to keep it. The proposition of the people was merely a bald scheme of robbery. It was subversive of all property rights; was socialistic, agrarian, and revolutionary; and to force him to accept of a price so inadequate would strike a fatal blow at the best interests of the society and undermine the whole fabric on which the rights of property rested.

"This reasoning was, of course, entirely conclusive to the monarch, who was undoubtedly the confederate of the farmer of imposts, but, as human endurance can only be stretched to certain limits, it was agreed between them that a fair price for the wind, at that date, would be 10 times what was originally paid for it. This amount was finally raised by a long-suffering people, who merely exacted a promise from the commercial monarch that he would never sell the wind again, but permit it in God's providence to blow over them free and unrestricted as of yore."

[Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time did I save?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back half a minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield six and one-half minutes to the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment which the clerk will report for the information of the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. As I understand, these amendments are not offered simply for the information of the committee, but they are intended to be pending.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, under this unanimous-consent agreement, when the gentleman gets time the amendment will be read in the gentleman's time, and at the proper time will be pending. There are several which have been read. They can not all be pending now.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not my understanding of the agreement that the reading of amendments is to be taken out of the time of any gentleman. He has so much time at the conclusion of the reading of the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand the Chair to hold that it is in order to have any number of amendments pending at one time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so hold and has stated the contrary. Other amendments have been read, and they can not all be pending at one time. The amendment can only be read for the information of the committee, and at the proper time, if the gentleman from Illinois gets a chance, he can offer his amendment. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that if he yields six and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Illinois wishes to offer an amendment and have it read, it may take all the six and one-half minutes to have it read, and the Chair thinks that ought to be counted against the gentleman's time.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not my intention that the time consumed in reading amendments shall be counted against anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. It has got to be counted against somebody.

Mr. ADAMSON. In securing the unanimous consent I intended that there should be so much time exclusive of the time occupied in reading amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yielded a certain amount of time to the gentleman from Illinois, which he can use in any way he desires.

Mr. ADAMSON. If I had offered an amendment, I think I should have offered it before commencing to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is running.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. He is always entertaining and usually correct in his philosophy, in his language, and his pure diction. I am always charmed with him, but I can not agree with him in his position with reference to this proposition. I have sent up an amendment, which I desire to have read some time before this section is passed, and on which I desire to have a vote. That amendment provides that the grantees of this water power shall pay into the Treasury of the United States a sum not to exceed 10 per cent of the gross income of the business which is run in whole or in part by hydroelectric power generated by the water from these dams. I also provide in that amendment that the control and regulation of the percentage which is to be charged shall be under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think that is where that power properly belongs. While I have no disposition to take away from the Secretary of War any of the powers which have been conferred upon that great department of the Government, yet we have an independent body, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which in my opinion is driving further away from political tendencies in government than any other body which has ever been organized since the beginning of this Government. [Applause.]

I have as much admiration and confidence in all of the heads of our Government as any other citizen, but they are usually handicapped in some way whereby they are not able to go direct at propositions and give that clear and unbiased consideration that I think ought to be given in cases of this character. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe the control of this proposition ought to be under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has characterized the position occupied by some of the gentlemen on the floor of this House, men who have in their wisdom decided that the great powers of nature ought to be conserved to the people of the country, as being somewhat visionary.

The gentleman from Georgia is usually sound, and stands upon propositions with much reason and judgment, but in this case I am afraid that his fears of the intervention of the Federal Government with what he terms State rights is driving him away from one of the greatest rights the people of this country have, and that is to conserve the powers of nature to the people so that these great rights will not be bartered away to the hands of the few perpetually.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is the right to extend?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent was granted to all who made remarks to extend.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, was there any of my time taken up in the colloquy that occurred?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman had used the whole of his time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am for the Lindbergh amendment, and if that fails I am for the Sherley amendment. I am for the Sherley amendment because it establishes a principle—the right of the Government to make a charge for the concession, the privilege which it has granted to the grantee, the hydroelectric company. I am for it for the further reason that if the Sherley amendment is incorporated in this bill and the bill becomes a law, there will follow, by reason of the Sherley amendment, the right of the Government to supervise the conduct of the company and to oversee its affairs in many respects, among them in respect to overcapitalization and its evils and injustices.

For, however much the constitutional lawyers may derogate the idea, the minute the Government exercises its right to make a charge for the benefits accruing to the grantee, the Government becomes in part a partner in the business of power production.

This bill has had a curious history. From the beginning until this moment the history of the bill is one of conflict. Antecedent to the time that the bill made its appearance here there was a clash between the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior. When the bill made its appearance here in its first form there was a conflict between two great committees over its provisions—the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which presented it, and the committee which has been most zealous and tireless in attacking it, the Committee on the Public Lands.

After the bill was presented, an event which occurred one afternoon several weeks ago, and a couple of speeches had been made upon it, one by myself, there was a sudden cessation in operations. The bill was taken away from the House and consideration here, and was carried to the White House where there were one or two or three conferences, to which were invited by the President, if I am informed correctly, some of the members of the Committee on the Public Lands and some of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and if I mistake not, the two Secretaries, or at least one of them.

In the White House the measure was given perfecting touches and was brought back here apparently with the idea that it was now in such a condition that the House would accept it without question. But from the moment the very first line in the bill was reached there has been a contest here on the floor of the House, which has raged with increasing ferocity. Contrary to the usual thing in the consideration of bills, this has been materially changed in all its major sections. Undoubtedly the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will be adopted. The House is not for the measure. I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky or the others proposed will make the bill such that I shall vote for it. The measure was wrong at the start. And back of the conflict between the secretaries and the conflict between the committees and the emendations in the White House a greater conflict has grown in the imagination of the Members here, the conflict between the impersonal government and the powers which prey upon its resources, the battle between the voracious captains of industry who will finance these works and the interest of the Government and the people we represent. [Applause.]

Every one of the works which would be constructed under the provisions of this bill would be constructed only by the sufferance of the men who control the necessary capital, the financial kings who hold in their power the credit of the country. It is this sentiment, thoroughly aroused, which is demanding that the measure be made over. The first right of the Government to protect is in part taken care of by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky—giving the Government supervision over the work and its financial conduct. But there are other changes to be made. One of its most important sections has not been in controversy virtually at all. Neither the Committee on Public Lands nor the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has given the attention to the question of length of franchise that it deserves. We are granting a 50-year franchise. No one here will survive for 50 years. No one here to-day has discussed the matter of the rights of the people during the next 50 years under the provisions of the bill. There has been interminable discussion about the right to terminate the franchise at the end of 50 years, but what about the intervening time between the day of the construction of the work and the time the Government has the right to terminate the grant? One of the virtues of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota is that they give the Government the right to look in during that period.

years to resurvey the affairs of the grantee, and every 10 years thereafter to put in a correcting and guiding hand.

Mr. Chairman, Gifford Pinchot, as president of the National Conservation Association, has issued the following statement on this measure:

Every friend of conservation will receive with keen disappointment the recent announcements from the White House that the administration indorses the Adamson dam bill in its amended form. This is an unfortunate and needless surrender to the power interests on the threshold of victory for the people. It is a direct reversal of the conservation policy which both President Roosevelt and President Taft supported and acted upon. The Adamson bill is a direct rebuff to the many patriotic men and women who for the last decade have fought the water-power grabbers.

In a statement on June 1, I called attention to the fact that the Adamson bill was much more favorable to the water-power interests than to the public interest. It was precisely the kind of bill the power people wanted. It did not protect the public, and therefore was indefensible. This was fully proved when the bill came before the House for consideration during the first week in July. Its most important provisions are in conflict with the present dam act and the policies now in force in the Departments of Agriculture and of the Interior. The recent amendments to the bill, approved at the White House conferences, unbelievable as it may seem, fail to bring the bill into line with these policies. The bill as it stands is a thoroughly bad bill.

It does not require the power companies to pay to the public for the valuable privileges they receive. It was largely for a like failure that the presidential vetoes were made of the James River Dam bill in 1909 and the Coosa River Dam bill in 1911. After the seven years' fight to make the power interests adequately compensate the Government for special privileges, they are now invited to help themselves to what they may chose on our navigable streams. Certainly the great power combinations who will ultimately get these franchises can well afford to pay for them.

The Adamson bill does not protect consumers within the States from extortion in case the State governments fail to act.

It makes substantially impossible the taking back of the public rights granted, even when the ostensible 50-year period of the grant has expired.

It gives the water-power people the right to saddle the Government with the unearned increment in land values if it ever should succeed in resuming its rights.

It would apparently require the Government to take over the whole electric-lighting plant of a city in order to get possession again of the water power owned by the people, if that power were the source from which the lighting plant was supplied.

This bill prevents the amendment or repeal of a grant or franchise except when Congress "determines that the conditions of consent have been violated."

The conservationists have always insisted that the grant should be made for a definite period, and that 50 years was a reasonable period. The Adamson bill provides that the grant shall be for "50 years from and after the date of the completion of the dam described in the original approval, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until compensation has been made to said grantee for the fair value of its property." This is substantially an indeterminate grant, and clearly not a grant for a 50-year period, for the grantee, at the end of the grant, can, by litigation of the question of "fair value," not only extend the grant to an indefinite period, but also tie the hands of Congress.

The Adamson bill in its present form is full of jokers, and is lacking in important safeguards to protect the public interest. It does not, for example, require publicity of accounts and capitalization. Above all, it is deeply to be regretted that the administration should have given its indorsement to a bill which is so directly opposed to the public interest. The Adamson bill embodies what the conservationists have been fighting against. Its passage would be a sweeping victory for the water-power monopolists.

There are other and many other amendments needed to put the measure in shape, if indeed it can be at all. But it is gratifying to see Congress at last alive to the question of conservation and open to suggestions.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, one thing that has struck me more forcibly than anything else during the discussion of this bill is the unanimity with which lawyers in this House disagree as to our constitutional rights, and if the lawyers differ so greatly, I do not think it worth while for me to enter into the constitutional features of the bill, but I do sincerely hope that the bill will pass and become a law for the sake of the development of the West, if for no other purpose. The Members from the far West have gone before the Board of Navigation Engineers for years and have asked that certain great rivers which we have in the West shall receive recognition and be improved by the Federal Government and make possible navigation upon those streams, and invariably we find that we run up against the same answer when they make their final reports, that they have examined the streams and have decided that the population was not great enough to warrant the outlay or expense. We tried to impress on their minds that if the Government would improve these rivers it would be only a short time when the population would increase many fold, but that is not the policy of the Government. They want to wait until the population is there. If the Government of the United States would allow a bill of this kind to become a law and private capital to improve the rapids and falls of the Columbia River—the Priest Rapids and the Kettle Falls and other points on that river where they could develop water power—they could not only make that stream navigable for hundreds of miles where it is not navigable now, but they could furnish water to irrigate hundreds of thousands of acres of as fine land as there is on earth after the water is on it, and they could develop great hydroelectric power for the manufacture of fertilizer. We have immense deposits of limerock and those things from which that is manufactured.

But we can not get capital to interest itself in this development on account of too stringent restrictions, and, as far as the development of the West in concerned, it amounts to the acting of the dog in the manger. The dog can not eat the hay himself, and he will not let the horse eat it.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in conservation as much as any man, but I do not want that class of conservation which puts the development of this country so far into the future that neither we nor our children will benefit from it. [Applause.] I have come to think, and I believe history bears me out in it, that the American people are extremists. In the first place, we made it so easy to acquire everything under the Government that some abuses crept in, and then as soon as the cry was raised that there were abuses under the Government we swung to the other extreme, and now we have come to the point where any man who bobs up and asks for a franchise of any kind or who tries to make some development is immediately classed as a plutocrat, and he has no standing in the American Congress or before the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER].

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, heretofore we have been giving away water-power sites forever. But now we are going to be progressive and give them away for 50 years. As reported from committee this bill provided for the giving away of these valuable rights for 50 years without one cent of compensation to the Government. To my mind this is an outrageous proposition.

On Saturday the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] read the following statement from the Secretary of War, who is represented as favoring this bill:

There is no justification for a policy of do nothing.

I can not agree with the Secretary of War. This bill presents an exception to the rule. If a bank employee was contemplating the looting of a bank, would it not be better for him to do nothing than to loot it?

If we can not to-day frame a bill without giving away the people's river for 50 years without a cent of compensation to the people for their property, then, I say, let us pass no bill at this time and permit this subject to go over to some subsequent Congress for final action. It will never be too late to give the rivers away to the capitalists, if that is all we desire to accomplish. If gentlemen here desire to be philanthropists, let them give away their own property; they have the right to be generous, but not with other people's property.

This is supposed to be a conservation bill. We propose to conserve the people's rivers by giving them away for 50 years without a penny of compensation to the people who rightfully own them. When we were elected to Congress by the people they did not delegate us to come here and give their property away for nothing. It is our sworn duty to protect the people's rights, not to allow the Water Power Trust to grab them, and grab them for 50 years without having to pay a cent of compensation to the Government. Every man born into the world inherits a part of it, and we have no right to sacrifice, at least without fair and adequate compensation, the people's natural God-given ownership of it. To do so would be to betray the people. This Congress has passed many measures in the interests of the masses of the people, but to pass this bill as reported from committee would be to injure the glorious record we have made. It would ruin us. I do not want it said of me, and it shall not be said of me, 5 years from now or 10 years from now, or ever, that I was one of those Members of Congress who voted to give the Water Power Trust a 50-year franchise on the rivers of this country without one cent of compensation to the Government.

I am in favor of passing a bill now if we can amend it so that it will be in the interests of the people, for whose welfare it is our duty to legislate, instead of wholly and absolutely in the interests of the water-power groups of the country.

Before many years come and go men will be occupying these seats that we now occupy who will not be willing to give away the rights of the people to the rivers for 50 years, or 25 years, or any number of years, without compensation. And if we can not do anything now but surrender everything to the water-power magnates, then let us permit the solution of this problem to await the coming of these men who will take a different view than the gentlemen who framed this bill.

I have for some time been working on a bill looking toward a huge Government power plant in the Mississippi River at a point near Rock Island and Moline to be determined by the Army Engineers. My idea is to have the Government build and operate this plant, and sell the power directly to consumers practically at cost. The Mississippi is, or should be, the people's property, and if it is to be harnessed, it should be in their interest. If a few capitalists are permitted to harness the river, it will, judging from past experiences, only enrich them at the expense of all the people; while if the Government can be induced to swing the project, the entire community will be benefited.

In the congressional district I represent we have both a Government owned and operated water-power plant and a privately owned one.

The Government owns its own power plant in the Mississippi River at the Rock Island (Ill.) Arsenal, and, according to a statement of the commandant, Col. George W. Burr, which I will insert in the RECORD, the Government is developing its power there at a cost of 3 mills per kilowatt hour.

Some 50 miles down the river is the great privately owned Keokuk Dam and power plant, the greatest on this continent. Using the same water in the same river, this private company to which Congress generously granted a franchise to harness the Mississippi forever without a cent of compensation to the Government is charging the consumers from 10 to 14 cents per kilowatt hour, which is from 30 to 50 times more than it costs the Government, or than it would cost the people at Rock Island if the Government was to sell it directly to the consumers at actual cost. Imagine what a stimulus a great water-power plant would be to any community if power was to be sold for 3 mills a kilowatt hour. It would mean great factories, increased employment, and added opportunities and happiness for all.

The statement of Col. Burr to which I refer was published as an interview in the Rock Island Argus of July 7, and was brought about as the result of an intimation made on the floor of the House that water power at the Rock Island Arsenal was more expensive than steam power.

Col. Burr states that by a comparatively small expenditure the capacity of the Rock Island power plant can be greatly increased, and that the additional power can be sold direct to users to the advantage of the Government, consumers, and all concerned. This statement is of intense interest to me, and I have already written Col. Burr to send me the necessary particulars so that I may ask Congress to provide for the increasing of the capacity of this water-power plant. The arsenal plant, however, is not the site I have in mind for a much larger Government-owned project, which is some distance away, and which project I intend to urge Congress to provide for.

The statement of Col. Burr as to the low cost of water power at Rock Island proves beyond successful contradiction that Rock Island is the logical site for a great central military manufacturing plant, which will become a necessity as soon as the Government enters upon the policy of taking the profit out of war and preparation for war by manufacturing all munitions in Government arsenals instead of buying a large part of such supplies from the ammunition ring and paying the outrageously excessive prices demanded for them. The article referred to reads as follows:

[Reprinted from the Rock Island Argus, July 7, 1914.]

"In speeches in Congress June 23 Congressmen DONOHOE and MOORE, of Pennsylvania, in an attempt to secure appropriations for the Frankford Arsenal, questioned the extent of the Rock Island Arsenal water power, and compared unfavorably the cost of power developed there with the cost of steam-generated power at the Frankford Arsenal, and in other ways made claims as to the superior advantages of the Frankford Arsenal as compared with the Rock Island Arsenal. Congressman CLYDE H. TAVENNER promptly replied to these gentlemen in a speech replete with facts and figures fully sustaining the reputation of the Rock Island Arsenal.

"To secure an independent statement on this subject, an Argus representative called on Col. G. W. Burr, the commanding officer of the Rock Island Arsenal, and requested an interview covering the subject of the comparison. Col. Burr declined to give such an interview, stating that Rock Island Arsenal needed no defense; that its record and work spoke for it and are being recognized in the constantly increasing volume of work being done at the arsenal, and stated that it would be manifestly improper for him to engage in a controversy on the relative merits of two arsenals of the Ordnance Department. Col. Burr, however, consented to talk about arsenal water power, as that is a matter concerning which the facts and figures are of public record, and the Argus is pleased to present the substance of his complete statement on this subject.

"It will be noted that, whereas the champions of the Frankford Arsenal claim that power at Rock Island Arsenal costs $0.024 per kilowatt hour, Col. Burr shows that it actually costs only $0.0036 per kilowatt hour, and that, by any proper method of accounting, it costs the Government nothing, but that, on the contrary, the Government really gets its power for nothing and is richer annually from owning the water power. An interesting point made by Col. Burr is that the Government at small expense could put in machinery on its water-power dam and sell power in this community to the great benefit of the community and to a large annual profit of the United States Treasury. Incidentally it is shown that steam-generated power, which is stated to cost $0.0108 at the Frankford Arsenal, is actually purchased for less than that sum at Rock Island and is understood to be manufactured at a cost not exceeding $0.008 per kilowatt hour, which goes far to substantiate the claims of Rock Island Arsenal's champions that the arsenal is the most economical place for Government manufacture.

"Mr. DONOHOE, in his speech in Congress, said:

"The maximum power that can be developed by the Rock Island Dam is 1,450 horsepower."

"Col. Burr shows that it is 9,000 horsepower, and that the arsenal power project as now developed will give 22,000 horsepower.

"Col. Burr's statement is as follows:

"I am unable to give any figures as to the exact cost of steam-generated power at this arsenal because we have not recently had any experience with steam plants. The arsenal has a contract with a commercial power distributing company to furnish it electrical power when required, and this electrical power is steam generated. The amounts used are small and are asked for at irregular times, so that the contract for furnishing the power can not be considered a desirable one. The contract calls for $0.01 per kilowatt hour. Since it must be assumed that the contractor is not in business for pleasure, and that he makes a profit on the power thus sold, which he delivers to the arsenal over a long transmission line, it would probably be safe to say that steam-generated power does not actually cost him over $0.008 per kilowatt hour. The arsenal water-power project is a much larger subject, but I give you facts and figures respecting it, which are a matter of record and can not be disputed. These are made for the purpose of giving a correct and comprehensive statement of the subject, which is of great local interest.

"The Mississippi River from the foot of Campbells Island to the foot of the arsenal island, a distance of 5 miles, has a fall of approximately 14 feet over a chain of rapids which, from the earliest times, has made navigation difficult. At the arsenal island the river divides, one branch which forms the navigation channel passing to the north and the other branch which forms the arsenal water-power pool passing to the south of the island. In 1867 the Government, by an agreement pursuant to authority of Congress, took over the water-power rights in this part of the river, and since that time the Ordnance Department, as represented by the Rock Island Arsenal, has endeavored to develop and perfect the water-power project. Congress from time to time has made appropriations for this purpose. The total of these appropriations for the development of the water power at the Rock Island Arsenal is $1,624,750, while the total of the appropriations for extraordinary repairs to this water power is $246,150. The contention that the power used at the arsenal is expensive is based on figures using the appropriations as a permanent investment in this water power and computing interest on this investment at 3 per cent as a part of the cost of the power.

"That any computations based on such assumptions are erroneous is clearly shown by a consideration of the facts. In systems of accounting it is considered necessary to charge off from capital accounts funds expended for purposes subsequently found ineffective or for appliances worn out or destroyed. The correct present-day capitalization of a railroad does not include the cost of buildings and equipments and bridges long since destroyed, of ties rotted, and rails and locomotives worn out and consigned to the scrap heap in years past, or of track constructed and subsequently abandoned, but includes only the property and equipment of the going concern. Similarly, the capitalization to be used in computing any correct cost of power at the arsenal power plant would charge off expenditures of a similar class. Yet the figures which have been used in an attempt to figure this cost include the cost of a dam washed away 30 years ago, of a power house with machinery destroyed by fire 15 years ago, of dikes erected for the protection of Government land and as an aid to navigation and in no wise connected with the water-power project, as well as moneys ineffectively spent in earlier days in the development of the power project itself.

"For many years, in fact until a few years ago, the Ordnance Department, in the attempt to develop the water power, sought to turn the waters of the Mississippi River into the branch of the river south of the island. On the other hand, that department of the Government charged with the improvement of the navigation of the river endeavored to improve the channel to the north of the island, or, in other words, to increase the flow of the river in that channel. Thus two departments of the Government were working at cross purposes, and Congress was impartially voting money to each for the furtherance of these opposing projects. Any money so spent for water power 30 or 40 years ago, and which proved ineffective for its permanent improvement, should be charged off and not included in present costs of power.

"About 1900, in the further development of the water power, the short dam extending up the middle of the river from the arsenal island was extended for a distance of about 2½ miles upstream to a point above the rapids. It was then suggested that the navigation of the river could be much improved and the almost insuperable navigation difficulties which the rapids presented could be effectively overcome by using the water-power pool as a navigation channel and passing boats up or down the river through a lock. This scheme was adopted, and in recent years the two departments of the Government concerned with the navigation and the water-power projects have worked in unison to increase the volume and amount of water in the pool. At the present time the north channel of the river has been considerably shallowed at the rapids and the waters of the river diverted to the water-power pool to increase the depth of the water there for navigation purposes. This increased depth of water gives increased head at the arsenal water power. Since the power pool is now the navigation channel and the north branch of the river merely a spillway for excess or unused water and since the Government owns all the water-power rights in the pool it follows that the Government is entitled to use for water-power purposes all the flow of the river at this point not required for navigation purposes.

"The extreme low-water flow of the Mississippi River at this point is conservatively stated at 20,000 cubic feet per second. This low-water flow with the available head gives 28,000 theoretical horsepower that can be developed at the Government power project without any great additional expense and without any rebuilding of the existing dams, dikes, etc. This is the theoretical horsepower, and at least 22,000 of this theoretical horsepower can be actually generated if suitable machinery is installed. These figures are given for the extreme low-water stage of the river. At higher stages the amount of power that can be developed rapidly increases, and there is usually sufficient flow in the river to give 100,000 horsepower. Therefore the minimum horsepower that can be developed at the Government power project at any and all stages of the river is 22,000 horsepower. Of this amount 9,000 horsepower has been developed at the present arsenal dam.

"The arsenal water power was not used by the Government for many years. Its first practical use for Government purposes dates from about 1890. The plant for generating power was destroyed by fire in 1899, and the present installation dates from that time. Much of the moneys appropriated in the earlier years for the development of the power was lost in work which served its purpose at the time but has since been abandoned. Examples are the Moline Dam wall, not now used, the first Government dam, which was washed away 30 years ago, and the power-house machinery, destroyed by fire in 1899. Aside from the existing dam, which cost $275,000, practically all of the expenditures on this account prior to 1899 should properly be written off on account of obsolescence. The capital investment of the Government on this basis would, therefore, amount to the cost of the dam plus the congressional appropriations since that date, or a total of $426,850, and the interest on this sum at 3 per cent is $12,805.50. If the entire power which has been developed were utilized, this sum would be an annual charge against the cost of power at the arsenal, but, as will be hereafter shown, the arsenal is using only 15 per cent of the power which has been developed at its dam, and therefore only 15 per cent of the sum, or $1,875, should be so charged. In addition Congress makes an annual appropriation of $12,500 for the maintenance and operation of the power plant. This covers all expenses for material and labor for operation and repairs and includes the upkeep of the 85 per cent of developed power not used as well as the 15 per cent actually used. Obviously money spent in the ordinary upkeep of unused property is not a proper charge to present cost of power. Therefore, making a liberal charge for used power of $9,000 out of the $12,500 appropriated, the total annual cost of the arsenal power is $10,875. The arsenal uses annually 3,000,000 kilowatt hours of electricity, so that on this basis the cost is $0.0036 per kilowatt hour.

"In cost keeping it is customary to make allowances for depreciation and to take credit for appreciation in value. It is therefore pertinent to inquire as to the present value of arsenal power development. As stated, the minimum horsepower that can be developed in the arsenal power project at any and all stages of the river is 22,000 horsepower, of which it is roughly estimated that 18,000 is available for Government disposition. This power, if sold to a commercial distributing concern, would bring $15 per horsepower per year, or a total income of $270,000. Allowing $50,000 for maintenance, operation, and obsolescence of the plant would leave $220,000 profit, which on the 3 per cent Government basis would give a capital value of $7,666,000. This valuation for the arsenal power project is confirmed by the fact that the great Mississippi River dam and power project at Keokuk, Iowa, a short distance below Rock Island, has been built in the last few years at a cost of $25,000,000. Further, there is a bill now before Congress for permission to construct a dam at the foot of the Le Claire rapids of the Mississippi River, and only a short distance above the arsenal development. This proposed water-power project would be, in respect to power possibilities, a duplicate of the arsenal project. Yet, to develop this Le Claire project, it is proposed to construct a dam at an expense of $10,000,000. Therefore an estimated present value of $7,666,000 for the Rock Island Arsenal water power is exceedingly reasonable, and its development for the small total of $1,624,750 appropriated by Congress must be regarded as a most profitable investment. It is a permanent, indestructible property, increasing annually in value, and which will continue to increase in value after all existing steam plants are consigned to the scrap heap. The annual increment in value of the Government water-power holdings here has been and is and will continue to be so great as to make comparatively insignificant the small sums spent from time to time to perfect and protect this property. Any discussion of cost of power at this plant which omits consideration of this factor is valueless.

"The Government owns and has developed here an immense water-power project which is capable of furnishing all the power needed for the R. I. A., and in addition an immense surplus of power which should be disposed of to the profit of the Government. The present arsenal water-power dam has 41 openings. If modern water wheels were placed in these openings, 9,000 horsepower could be generated, and the cost of operation, maintenance, and repairs would be but little greater than it is at the present time when only 15 per cent of that power, or 1,400 horsepower, is being generated. If, out of this 9,000 horsepower, 2,000 should be reserved for the use of the arsenal and the remaining 7,000 sold to commercial power-distributing companies, which could be done at $15 per horsepower per year, the resulting income to the Government would be $105,000. Deducting from this $35,000, as a liberal allowance to cover the cost of all expenses of operation, repairs, and obsolescence, the Government would have left $70,000 annual profit, and at the same time would greatly benefit the community. This can be done at the present dam by merely putting in the necessary generating machinery. It would utilize a power which the Government now has and permits to go to waste.

"The water wheels and generating machinery at present installed in the power plant are antiquated and inefficient. Originally designed to give 2,200 horsepower, the plant is actually generating but approximately 1,400 horsepower; that is, just enough for the present requirements of the arsenal The surplus power, when there is any, is small in amount and is intermittent. The result is that, although the arsenal now has a contract to sell its surplus power, the contractor takes but a negligible quantity, because power so furnished in small quantities and at irregular times is of no value to him in his business. If, however, the Government would put in a plant which was capable of developing an assured surplus, a ready sale for it would be found at a price only slightly below the cost of steam-generated power.

"It is evident from the foregoing that the arsenal power instead of being expensive is cheap, actually costing in money paid out $0.0036 per kilowatt hour, which is a small fraction of what steam-generated power costs; that, if account be taken of the increased market value of the water-power property, the power used at this arsenal costs nothing, but that, on the contrary, the Government is several million dollars richer through its ownership; and, finally, that if the Government will put in modern machinery and handle its water-power property as a business proposition and for the benefit of the community, it will get its arsenal power for nothing, will enjoy the annual increment in value of the property, and will have turned into the Treasury annually cash profits of from $70,000 to $220,000."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have one more gentleman who is here, and there are three other gentlemen who desire time and who do not happen to be here at this moment. I yielded to my friend from Washington, who does not seem to be here, but his colleague [Mr. JOHNSON], who desires time, is here, and I yield him five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to borrow 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I can not give the gentleman 10 minutes, but I can yield him 5 minutes. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] in reference to water power at Rock Island. It occurs to me to state at this moment out my way we have some rapids in one of the five great rivers of the United States—a water-power possibility that will take five, six, or seven million dollars to get under way and eighteen or twenty millions more to complete. This water has been running away ever since time began, and it will run away through the sagebrush for another two, three, or four hundred years if all of the restrictions which are proposed are placed in this bill.

Mr. TAVENNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would be glad to do so.

Mr. TAVENNER. Is it our fault we are permitting it to run on unused now? Should we not provide for the Government to develop that power?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the exact point. Where is the great sum to come from for this badly needed development? If it were proposed that the United States should supply it, Members of Congress from some of the thickly settled communities would object immediately to any proposition that would expend so enormous a sum of the people's money in the sagebrush area. And yet the placing of water power there in a State where we sell the water power as low as a quarter of a cent per kilowatt would bring a population in four or five years of 100,000 thriving people in a place which is now almost unpeopled. We have there an enormous unharnessed water power. In spite of the claims of other gentlemen here I have not the slightest doubt in the world that one-sixth at least of the unharnessed water power of the United States is in the southwestern district of the State of Washington, and it will run unharnessed and be idle for the next thousand years, and our people will continue to ask and solicit capital to come there to look into it. They are trying and offering every inducement that they can. These bills come up and restrictions are put on so that the water will run away unused. We have had a great touch of timber conservation—enough, I think. And yet we talk about having men come to Congress in the years to come to do something to save unused water and lay it aside for our children's children's grandchildren. I do hope this bill will be passed one way or the other, so we will know in the far West whether we will go ahead or stand still.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, there are, I think, three objections which have been made to the provisions of this amendment providing for compensation to the National Government. First, that it is unconstitutional. I have not the time to argue that question; in my own mind it is absolutely clear that we have the constitutional right so to do. It has been very fully argued during this debate and the constitutionality well sustained. Then there are those who believe the amendment interferes with State rights. Now, a word to my Democratic friends about State rights. I am as much in favor of State rights and State duties as any man, but I object to having a national question that can be handled for the public benefit of all only by the National Government made subject to the doctrine of State rights. I am opposed to seeing private interests and national wrongs hide behind the obsolete and worn-out barrier of State rights. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will point out some of the reasons why the entire water power upon navigable streams is a national question and can not be dealt with by States. In the first place, there is hardly a navigable stream in this country that is not an interstate stream. It draws its source from many States; it is frequently a boundary between States. The National Government is spending millions of dollars acquiring watersheds in the East to feed these navigable streams. Not only is water power interstate in its source, but it is interstate in its distribution and use. Power can be distributed 300 miles profitably. Water power developed in my State is transmitted into Massachusetts, Maine, and Vermont, and we as a State can not regulate that, because we are interfering with interstate commerce. Therefore this question of the regulation of water power on navigable streams is one that can be handled only by the National Government.

A word on the question of taxation. I do not believe in the Federal Government taxing property which the State should tax. A clear and logical line can be drawn between the property of a water-power company within the State, which the State should tax, and the value of the franchise which the National Government should derive a revenue from. The National Government is the only one that can give the franchise to develop the power. The value of that franchise is given by the National Government, and any revenue from it should go to the National Government. The State can tax, and should tax, the actual physical property, but it should be denied the power to tax the value of a franchise which it did not grant and could not grant. [Applause.] Therefore, if this amendment should be adopted, I shall offer an amendment which is in Secretary Garrison's original bill, that the State may tax the physical property of these water-power companies, but it shall add no value for any franchise given under this act. That would distinguish properly between State taxation and Federal compensation.

There are other men who believe that while we have the constitutional right, it is bad policy at the present time to provide for any compensation, because it will prevent development. In the first place, let me point out to those gentlemen that you are deciding in this bill a question of public policy against the people that you represent, on your judgment to-day, for 50 years. If you adopt this bill as originally reported, you not only say that you do not believe in the policy, but you deny the right to every Congress of the United States that shall follow us for 50 years to vary your judgment in the matter. I believe we should lean toward the public interests, because we are here to protect public interest, and if we should make this bill so strict that no water-power development would go on, the very next Congress or the Congress after that could change it, and the damage would be but temporary. But pass this bill as the committee recommends it and you have given away the rights of the American people beyond recall for 50 years. That is a long time in the industrial development of America. The development of electrical power by water is only about 20 years old in this country. Who can foretell what the future will be, and who dare stake his judgment now and on that judgment bind the rights of the American people? [Applause.]

I believe in compensation, because it is the only way you can secure to the people who grant the franchise some of the benefits of development. Regulation by State authorities will not apply to over half of these water powers. They will be used for private manufacturing. And even for those that are used in public-service corporations the regulation amounts to nothing in a large part of the community. I can demonstrate beyond dispute by a concrete example. In my State there is a big water power upon the Connecticut River that transmits power to the city of Lawrence, to be used there for manufacturing purposes. It sells power. It has power enough to supply only a few of the many manufacturing companies in Lawrence. There are many textile mills competing with one another. Would the commission of the State of Massachusetts compel that water-power company to sell A, a textile manufacturer, the power 50 per cent less than it would cost B, his competitor? Of course it would not. Coal will fix the price of water power. Therefore regulation will not protect the public from excessive profits in that part of the country where the demand for power is above that which the water power can supply. That applies largely to the East, in the manufacturing part of the country. Therefore compensation to the Federal Government is the only way the Government can prevent excessive profits and secure to the people, who grant the franchise, some of the benefits thereof. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe we have the power to levy a tax or a charge upon these corporations. I believe that it is our duty to do so. I believe it does not interfere and will not interfere, under a proper amendment, with the State power to tax. For my own part I would prefer to see no legislation at all, and trust to a future Congress to enact the proper kind of a bill, than to have the bill in the shape that it was reported to the House adopted by this session of Congress.

This bill is based upon the principles, first, that the National Government has no interest in water power, because water is private property; and, second, that it is a State matter any way; and I do not believe that men who hold those views, however honestly, are the men to draft and enact a proper conservation bill for the development of the water powers which rightfully belong to all the people for the benefit of all. [Applause.]

Allow me to say another word. There is a great deal said about the stagnation of development. You might get the impression, if you did not know the facts, that the action of the Government is causing stagnation in the water-power development all over the country. But as a matter of fact no other business in this country has been so profitable and has had such a great development in recent years. Every great group of water-power interests, such as the Stone & Webster people, the General Electric Co., and the Southern Power Co., own to-day enormous undeveloped water powers in addition to those that they have developed. They are getting possession of every water power they can get their fingers on, and they are holding many of them for future needs. In some instances they will not develop them, even where there is a demand for their development.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a short statement showing what the actual development of water power has been in the last five years?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. In 1908, as is shown by our hearings, the total developed water power in the United States was 5,400,000 horsepower in round numbers, and in 1913 it was 7,000,000 horsepower, an increase of 33 per cent in five years. So that there has been no stagnation at all.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. KENT. I would like to ask the gentleman to reply to that statement with the statement he made in his time, that what was being cold-storaged in 1909 is being cold-storaged to-day.

Mr. FERRIS. I have not that at hand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion there?

Mr. KENT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Is it not true that there has been no stagnation at all in the development of water powers, and that what delay there has been is because they could not get a right from Congress to develop them? There has been a conflict between Congress and the President over this question of a charge, and not a single water power has been stagnated because a charge was attempted to be exacted; not a single one.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the Sherley amendment, which provides:

> The Secretary of War may provide as a condition of such approval for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits that accrue to the grantee by the authority given under this act, and at the end of 20 years, and every 10 years thereafter, the Secretary of War may readjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable.

Mr. Chairman, for more than three years I have sat and listened to constitutional discussions. At first I used to be amused at their evident inconsequence, but I have ceased to be amused, because they waste so much time. What I have always wanted to know was what we can do and what it is our duty to do.

I am no wild-eyed theorist. I have been interested in business, sizable business, and I know that theory is essential in formulating lasting policies. The other day I stated what had been accomplished in Chicago in relation to the regulation of the traction system. We theorists, we dreamers, taught the traction people what they could do there in their own interest. We made them solvent and respectable.

Now, we have here a very simple, plain question: not a constitutional question, not a question of endlessly, foolishly quoting laws. The question is, Shall we grant or withhold? No one can deny that we have the right to refuse or a right to license. It is our choice. If we give privileges, we have the right to name the conditions under which they should be given. [Applause.]

It is not only our right, but our duty, under this inherent power to control all grants in the public interest.

You have heard over and over again the statement—the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made it, and I in my time made it—that there are certain cases where the cost of power from water power is vastly less than the cost of the additional power needed by any given community which must be secured by the burning of coal or other fuel. No abrogation of the right to derive revenue, to exact compensation from the water power granted by us, would in such a case relieve such a community that needs power, whether from both sources, from paying the higher charge based on the higher cost.

Here is a place where logic and common sense and not constitutional arguments go to show that the Federal Government for the interest of navigation and for a reduction of charges in a stuffed river and harbor bill ought to exact from the beneficiaries some payment toward improving navigation.

I for one hate the idea of indirect taxation. I have been absolutely consistent in that attitude. I have stood for every lowering of the tariff. I have stood against everything that means subsidy or an indirect taxation of the people, and to-day I would not place one cent of a burden upon the people who are ultimately to pay for water-power development. They should be given that water power at the lowest possible figure consonant with the proper earnings of the agencies that we permit to make the development.

As I stated in my remarks, which few heard or read, we have the right—nay, in my opinion, the duty—to develop this asset for ourselves. The Government is supreme in this matter, whether we put it on the ground of navigation or any other subterfuge or fiction. We know that the right to withhold means that we have the supreme control, and the consequent and clear duty to control in the interest of all the people of all the States and in the interest of the people of the several States, however short-sighted and foolish, back-numbered and oblivious those States may be.

The Chandler-Dunbar decision only clinches what has long been held—that the Federal Government can go onto the rivers, put in dams, and do whatever it chooses to do with the resultant power. I would never favor placing a tax upon users inconsonant with the cost of development plus a proper sinking fund. If we permit others to do for us what we can do for ourselves, they are our agents; we license them, and no discussion of constitutional law makes them anything different than licensees—agents. As such we ought to treat them squarely and protect them from the risks of unnecessary competition, give them a fair chance, and then hold them down to reasonable rewards for the service they render to the people by the license of the people. It is our duty to see to it that in granting these powers we do not rely upon State regulations. I am perfectly willing that the States should do their regulating, when they are willing to regulate.

But many of the States have no such idea. Many of them are still in the same backward condition that the Western States were when they approved of the great and scandalous railway land grants. They did not know that the people could build their own iron highways. They did not even know that such a theory was dangerously socialistic; and so in an imbecile blindness they argued that only through private agencies could real public highways be established, and they shouted in "Bandar-log" accord, "Please, private capital, we shall gladly pay anything on earth for building these railroads"; and so the railroads were built, at God knows what exorbitant cost to all the people forever.

We had better stand by our old original dam bill than to falter for a moment in forcing every amendment needed to make this foundling respectable. As the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] said, we had better hold things level than to open the field to extortion, to trusts, to combinations. There is not a man interested in conservation who does not wish the resources of this country opened up, who would not fight for proper development in every possible way; but we had better cold-storage our common assets for ourselves than to let the greedy ones cold-storage them for us, as would be the case if this sad parody of a bill should pass without fundamental amendments in the public interest. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the committee rise temporarily in order to allow the Speaker to lay a matter before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, when the Speaker signed the same.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. MANN. Was this rising by unanimous consent?

Mr. ADAMSON. Practically so.

Mr. MANN. I thought there was a motion made to rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I asked that the committee rise temporarily.

Mr. MANN. The committee will not resume its sitting, then, without action by the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general dam bill, H. R. 16053.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 16053.

Mr. MANN. Pending that, by unanimous consent, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I want to know how much time remains for debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think about 30 minutes. The Chair can state.

The SPEAKER. Forty minutes.

Mr. MANN. It is manifest that there will have to be a quorum of the committee here to vote on the amendments, and that probably would require a roll call. I simply want to get the gentleman's intention. Does the gentleman intend to stay until the matter is disposed of?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to finish the debate.

Mr. MANN. There is no object in finishing the debate unless you are going to have a vote. That is what I want to know.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know what will be done about that. I do not believe we can get a quorum to-night.

Mr. MANN. You could get a quorum of the Committee of the Whole by calling the roll, easily enough; but we would be running until after 6 o'clock, and I was desirous of knowing what the gentleman was going to do.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was my intention to move that the committee rise at the end of the debate.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we ought to rise as soon as we get through with the debate, without having a vote. We ought either to vote or else not finish the debate to-night.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the committee desire to vote, it is immaterial to me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would probably control that. I wanted to see whether he was willing that we go back into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are a number of amendments. We can not get through with them to-night.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that we ought at least to dispose of this amendment to-night. A great many gentlemen have come to me asking when the vote would be had, and have made arrangements to come back and vote. We will have just as much difficulty in the middle of the day to-morrow in getting a quorum as we will to-night.

Mr. MANN. To-morrow is "holy Wednesday." As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to finishing the voting to-night; but I would object decidedly to stay here and finish the debate and then immediately rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. Quite a number of Members have asked me about the vote on this amendment, and I stated that I did not know whether we would have a vote to-night or not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the power to require us to stay after we go into committee, but he has not now.

Mr. ADAMSON. If we go on with the debate for half an hours and then a quorum is demanded, I think we would have trouble.

Mr. MANN. I am not willing to go back into Committee of the Whole unless it is made definite.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the House desires to adjourn now or wait until the end of the debate, it is immaterial to me.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think the debate is going to run 40 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have requests from a number of gentlemen on this side, and they are ready now.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and they were so ready that they were out when the gentleman was hunting for speakers.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But they are here now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have requests for 20 minutes from several Members who are ready.

Mr. SHERLEY. Ten minutes of that is mine, and I am more anxious to get to a vote than I am to talk.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16053, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the Sherley amendment, although I do not feel certain that I would do that without change if I were writing the law. But if the Sherley amendment goes into the bill it will be considered in another body, probably pass that other body, be considered in conference, and be before this body again.

As I said the other day, I drew the original dam law, and knowing the controversy that would naturally arise in reference to compensation, did not write into that bill a specific provision for compensation, although I wrote into the bill a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to make conditions and stipulations. I thought, and still think, that gave the Secretary of War the right to exact the stipulation from the grantee for the payment of compensation. I think the Government ought to reserve the authority if it has the legal power to do so. There is doubt about our constitutional authority, in my judgment. I do not think it is entirely free from doubt. Of course there is no direct constitutional authority for the Federal Government to exact compensation for the privilege in reference to rivers, where our only jurisdiction is over navigation. But, on the other hand, it would seem to be common sense that when the Government has the right to give or refuse to give, that it may give on condition, may exact a stipulation from the grantee, that it will pay such compensation as may be fixed. I do not see how the grantee, having accepted an act of Congress, having had its plans approved by the Secretary of War on the condition that it will pay compensation and with the stipulation on its part directly made that it will pay compensation, how such a company is permitted to raise the question so long as it enjoys the franchise and operates the plant.

That is one side of the question. No one ought to suppose that in the ordinary case the Government would exact any large compensation. Most of the water powers which will be developed ought to be developed in such a way that the local community gets the benefit of the power which is produced, not only of the power that is produced, but of the fair competition which ensues from the production of the power. And yet there may be, and perhaps are, a great many cases where it will not be practicable to make the competition effective. If you produce 10,000 horsepower in a community by water power, and the community must use 50,000 horsepower, it is not possible to base the charge made for the 50,000 horsepower on the production of 10,000 horsepower by hydroelectric method if that is much cheaper than coal or other methods of producing power. There are cases where there ought to be actual compensation made.

Now gentlemen are very much exercised for fear that the financiers will not take the opportunity to invest money in these enterprises. I do not know; no one can tell about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Nearly all the street railways of the country, I think, operate on short-term franchises. In our State they can not exceed 20 years. I do not know how much money has been invested in street railways, but enormous sums. I recollect no instance where the investor in a street railway upon a short-term franchise has been robbed of his investment. Sometimes he has not secured the value he thought he had in watered stock, or something of that sort, but the public, through its Government, can afford, and, I think, is interested that these people should accept franchises from them.

I do not say that the Secretary of War on his own part, or that a future Congress, possessed with possible hysteria, will run wild, and that there will ever be any attempt made to deprive the investor of the value of his investment, or not to give him a reasonable return upon his investment if the operation of the plant warrants it. We are legislating for the future. It were better that this question be not settled to-day than that it be settled wrong. [Applause.] While this franchise it is proposed now to issue shall have the life of only 50 years, yet in effect, when the plant is made, it has an indefinite life. No one else can compete with the owner of the plant at the end of 50 years if the owner desires to retain possession of the plant, and he can better afford to do it on such terms as may be named, whatever they be, than anyone else.

Who would have supposed a few years ago that electric power could be transported 20 miles, much less 150 miles? Only a few years ago no one dreamed, unless he had eaten something unusual, that we would ever navigate the air. No one can foretell what 50 years will produce. While I think we have coal enough to last indefinitely, we ought to conserve the water power. It is not unlikely that we will soon be conserving and putting into reservoirs a surplus power made from the wind or from the tides or from the sunshine, and yet the part of experience should teach us to carefully conserve those things which we now have. We now have control over the water power. I think we ought to preserve to the Government its rights, and that people who accept the opportunity must accept it with the belief on their part that the Government will, after all, treat them justly. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used nine minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman still think he can spare me five minutes?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I can not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Kentucky care to go ahead now?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would rather not speak at this time. I do not want to make any lengthy statement.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I propose offering an amendment, which I will now read for information, on page 3, line 16, to insert, after the words "United States," the following:

Provided, That the value of all privileges which may be acquired under the terms of this act shall be subject to assessment triennially, and a tax equal to 5 per cent on such value shall be collected annually, the proceeds to be paid into the miscellaneous receipts of the Government.

In offering this amendment I wish to call attention to the fact that for the first time in our history we are proposing in the pending bill to change our navigable streams from free highways, open to all on equal terms, into highways subject to private control. In all legislation down to the present day our water highways have been withheld from the monopolistic domination to which we have permitted our iron highways and in some cases even our dirt highways to be subjected. Just as we are about to break the strangle-hold of monopoly on our iron highways through legislation which has passed this House and is about to pass the Senate, we are here proposing to turn over all the navigable streams of this great country to the Water Power Trust, leaving it a practically free hand in employing the vast privileges so granted in the exploitation of the people.

In our several States the control of the public highways has been kept largely free from private hands, but in many, if not in most of them, the turnpike company was set up in business, with the power to levy tribute on every horn and hoof, on every bale and bushel, on every wheel and runner passing over the public ways. Not until within comparatively recent years has common sense revolted against this monstrous perversion of a public function. It was, in fact, only yesterday that the tollgate ceased to bar the progress of peaceful travelers and to hold up legitimate traffic for private profit.

The theory of the old turnpike is the theory of this bill. The people were told they could not afford to build and maintain a passable highway. But if they would grant a private company the right to collect tolls on traffic, this company could and would do what all the people were too poor to do. The utter absurdity of the proposition is apparent, yet we are proposing to perpetuate it in this bill, because we are saying that the people of the United States—the 95,000,000 who live and labor under this Government—are too poor to make adequate and proper use of the vast and immeasurable natural resources embodied in our water highways with their undeveloped power. The 95,000,000, forsooth, must throw themselves on the tender mercies of a private monopoly which we are asked to create for the purpose of chaining this power and leading it captive into the channels of industry.

I am not ready to do this, as far as I am individually concerned. At least, I am not willing to create this new monopolistic monster without putting a ring in its snout and a chain about its leg. Hence the amendment which I have offered. Under the terms of that amendment the monopoly privilege will be subjected to a definite annual tax—the value of the privilege to be assessed every three years; the proceeds of the tax to go into the Public Treasury. This would insure a return to the public of the full value of the privilege conferred; and it would compel monopoly to render service in order to make profit. Kiting of bonds and other securities would be impossible.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I can yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON], but he has an amendment in respect to a subject different from that under discussion, and I would prefer that the gentleman from Illinois should have the last five minutes to discuss his new amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to close the debate or delegate some one else to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in charge of the bill is usually entitled to close debate.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Illinois informs me that he is willing to speak now, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not ask for this time for the purpose of discussing the Sherley amendment. It seems to me that the many reasons why that amendment should be adopted have been very ably presented, and I shall vote for the amendment. I have no doubt that it will be adopted. I ask for this time, because I have another amendment to that same section, and the time for the consideration of that section and all amendments thereto has been limited. I ask to have my amendment read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 11, by striking out the word "grant" in said line and inserting in lieu thereof the word "furnish," and also by inserting after the word "free" in said line the words "of cost."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if I may speak to this amendment for a moment, this does not change the meaning of the language in the bill. I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that on page 3, beginning with line 7, the bill says:

Whenever Congress shall deem such facilities necessary, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power.

That language places the United States in the attitude of being a grantee of the water-power company. I think that such language is unfortunate, when, as a matter of fact, the United States is the grantor, and that instead of using the word "grant" it would be better to use the word "furnish," and then the phraseology in line 9 of the bill would provide:

That persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall furnish to the United States, free of cost, water power or power generated from water, etc.

The amendment is offered merely for the purpose of changing that phraseology. As I say, it does not change the meaning, and I think the committee may be willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Kentucky wish to proceed now?

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman going to conclude?

Mr. ADAMSON. Is that the last speech of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am going to yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that while the gentleman has a right to conclude the debate he has not the right to yield to somebody else.

Mr. ADAMSON. I submit to the Chair if I can not yield to another gentleman to conclude debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the gentleman from Georgia is in control of the bill, and naturally the Chair recognizes him, and he controls the time. The gentleman from Georgia is fully familiar with the practice that an advocate of an amendment has the right to conclude the debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division. Was not a substitute offered for that amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Did not the gentleman from Minnesota offer a substitute for it?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair understood the Sherley amendment was the only one pending, and that the others were offered for information.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman from Minnesota in his own time offered a substitute, and it ought to be voted upon first.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, if the substitute was offered it would be voted upon first, and the question would come on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 29.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] offer a substitute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I withdraw the point.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered an amendment as a substitute——

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. It occurs to the Chair it ought to be voted upon. These amendments will be taken and voted upon in the order in which they were offered.

Mr. MANN. If this is an amendment to the amendment, ought it not to be considered before the substitute is voted on?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Is there not an amendment pending, the Sherley amendment, and then a substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, and then a substitute read for information offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas state who offered the amendment?

Mr. WINGO. I do not recall, but I remember the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed as to any amendment to the Sherley amendment except the one in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask to have the amendment again reported.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Minnesota offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment in the nature of a substitute, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, will be again reported.

Mr. MANN. It has not been yet reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and insert the following:

"The Secretary of War may provide as a part of the conditions and stipulations of such approval for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits which accrue to the grantee through authority given under this act. At the end of 25 years the Secretary of War may readjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable: Provided, however, That no charge made under this act shall be such as to deprive the grantee of a reasonable return upon the actual investment of the grantee in any project constructed and operating under the provisions of this act, including cost of maintenance, renewal, and depreciation charges."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

"The Secretary of War and the governor of the State in which the proposed development is to be made may, as a condition of such approval, provide for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits that accrue to the grantee through the authority given under this act; and at the end of 20 years, and every 10 years thereafter, the Secretary of War and the governor of the State in which the plant is located may readjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable; and, after deducting from such charges a sum sufficient to meet the actual cost of maintenance, the Treasurer of the United States shall pay the remainder to the State in which the plant is located: Provided, That when the dam is located between two States the said remainder of charges shall be divided equally between those States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ABERCROMBIE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the impression that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offered an amendment, which was not reported.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman sent it to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 16, after the word States, insert the following:
"Provided, That such grantee shall pay into the Treasury not more than 10 per cent of the gross income from all business operated in whole or in part by the power generated by such dam; that the authority to regulate and control the rate to be charged shall be under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 16, after the words "United States" insert:
"Provided, That the value of all privileges which may be acquired under the terms of this act shall be subject to assessment triennially, and a tax equal to 5 per cent on such value shall be collected annually, the proceeds to be paid into the miscellaneous receipts of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 24.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to call Members here at this hour.

Mr. MANN. We are willing to stay here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-one gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SHERLEY. That motion is not in order. The Clerk should call the roll.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am in order, when the point of no quorum is established, if I move to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 207 Members had answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 143, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia moved that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 11, by striking out the word "grant" in said line and inserting in lieu thereof the word "furnish," and also by inserting, after the word "free," in said line, the words "of cost."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 3. That as a part of said approval the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall require that the plans, specifications, and location for any dam shall be such as shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize, in the interests of navigation and water-power development, the water resources of the region.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R.16053 and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD on the subject of longevity pay.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of longevity pay. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the effect of the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 29, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Postmaster General, transmitting a schedule of papers and documents which are not needed in the transaction of public business and which, in the opinion of the department, have no permanent value or historical interest (H. Doc. No. 1133) was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers, and ordered to be printed:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16029) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to set aside certain public lands to be used as national sanitariums by fraternal organizations, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1030), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 1807) for the relief of Daniel M. Frost, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1027), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1124) for the relief of G. L. Taneyhill, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1028), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2472) for the relief of Herman von Werthern, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1029), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. THACHER: A bill (H. R. 18119) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard section 33 of the public-buildings act of March 4, 1913, as to site at Provincetown, Mass.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KAHN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 307) authorizing the President to extend invitations to other nations to appoint delegates or representatives to the International Engineering Congress, to be held at San Francisco, Cal., September 20 to 25, inclusive, 1915; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. POST: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 308) providing for a commission to complete the acquisition of lands for the extension of the Capitol Grounds, and providing for the payment thereof; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 18120) granting an increase of pension to Clay A. Armstrong; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BARTON: A bill (H. R. 18121) to correct the military record of Stephen L. Noland; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BEAKES: A bill (H. R. 18122) granting an increase of pension to Henry H. Howes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 18123) granting a pension to Thomas F. Cole; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18124) granting a pension to Delia A. Nikirk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOUGHTON: A bill (H. R. 18125) granting a pension to James W. Walls; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GILMORE: A bill (H. R. 18126) granting a pension to Helen M. Cummings; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GREGG: A bill (H. R. 18127) granting an increase of pension to Nancy A. McQueen; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 18128) for the relief of Oliver Bates; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 18129) granting a pension to Mary E. McCallum; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 20 strike out lines 20 and 21 in the following words:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful—

And insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce, which is hereby declared to be unlawful, embraces every act which tends to create a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of commerce, and also every act which tends to the monopolization, or attempted monopolization, or to the formation of a combination or conspiracy for the monopolization of any part of commerce,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask consent to have House bill 16586, being the railway securities bill, printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to state, merely for the information of the printer, that the parts which are crossed out are not to be printed, but the bill as it would read if the amendments recommended by the Senate committee were agreed to.

The bill follows:

An act (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 20 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be amended so as hereafter to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act; to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual report shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees, and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts affecting the same, as the commission may require; and the commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

"Said detailed reports shall contain all the required statistics for the period of 12 months ending on the 30th day of June in each year, or on the 31st day of December in each year if the commission by order substitute that period for the year ending June 30, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission; and if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within the time fixed by the commission, such party shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue to be in default with respect thereto. The commission shall also have authority by general or special orders to require said carriers, or any of them, to file monthly reports of earnings and expenses, and to file periodical or special, or both periodical and special, reports concerning any matters about which the commission is authorized or required by this law, or by any other law, to inquire or to keep itself informed or which it is required to enforce, including the matter of making public, by appropriate means, any information regarding the issuance by said carriers of stocks, bonds, or other evidences of interest or indebtedness. In such periodical or special reports the commission may require of the carrier, in addition to its income account, a balanced statement of its receipts and expenditures on capital account, and of the surplus of the income account accruing during the period covered by such statement, as well as of all other financial transactions that have taken place during such period, with whom had, whether in cash, in securities, or in other valuable consideration. The commission may also require the carrier to compile for the information of its stockholders such facts in regard to the financial transactions of the carrier for its fiscal year and in such form as the commission may direct.

"Such periodical or special reports shall be under oath whenever the commission so requires; and if any such carrier shall fail to make and file any such periodical or special report within the time fixed by the commission, it shall be subject to the forfeitures last above provided.

"Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of this act.

"The oath required by this section may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath by the laws of the place in which the same is taken.

"The commission shall have the power to investigate all financial transactions of said carriers and to examine into the actual cost and value of property acquired by, or services rendered to, said carriers. The directors, stockholders, officers, agents, attorneys, employees, receivers, or operating trustees of any carrier may be required by order of the commission to disclose every interest, direct or indirect, which they have in any transaction under investigation. In addition to the certificates and reports herein mentioned, the commission may require the carrier to furnish any further statements of fact or evidence that it may deem necessary or appropriate relating to business transactions of, for, or with said carrier.

"The commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as the receipts and expenditures of moneys, and it shall be unlawful for said carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission.

"In case of failure or refusal on the part of any said carrier to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda in the manner prescribed by the commission, said carrier shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

"The commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, memoranda, correspondence, documents, papers, and other writings of the carrier, regardless of the dates thereof, relating to transactions of, for, or with said carrier kept or preserved by or for, or in the care, custody, or control of said carrier, or of any person for said carrier: Provided, That all communications between attorney and client, giving or seeking professional advice, shall be deemed privileged.

"The commission may employ special agents or examiners, who shall have authority under the order of the commission to inspect, examine, and take copies of any and all accounts, records, memoranda, correspondence, documents, papers, and other writings to which the commission has the right of access as above provided. Failure or refusal to afford such access shall constitute an offense for which the offender shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense, and for each and every day of the continuance of the offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

"Any person or persons, natural or artificial, who shall willfully make, or cause to be made, any false entry in any accounts, records, or memoranda kept by a carrier subject to this act, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make, or cause to be made, full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep or cause to be kept any other accounts, records, or memoranda of said business than those prescribed or approved by the commission, or who shall willfully file, or cause to be filed, any application, certificate, or other paper required under this act containing false or erroneous statements of fact, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify any accounts, records, memoranda, correspondence, documents, papers, or other writings to which the commission has the right of access as above provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or, if a natural person, to imprisonment for a term of not less than one year nor more than three years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act of any director, stockholder, officer, agent, attorney, employee, receiver, operating trustee, or other person acting for or employed by any carrier, corporation, joint-stock company, or other corporate combination, acting within the scope of his employment, shall be deemed the act of the carrier, corporation, joint-stock company, or other corporate combination, as well as that of the person so acting. The commission may, in its discretion, issue orders designating the operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, documents, or other papers or writings to which the commission has the right of access as aforesaid, which may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time that all or any of the same shall be preserved.

"Any examiner who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of such examination, except in so far as he may be directed by the commission, or by a court or judge thereof, shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding two years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States at the request of the commission, alleging a failure to comply with, or a violation of, any of the provisions of said act to regulate commerce, or of any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of said acts, or any of them.

"And to carry out and give effect to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce or any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof the commission is hereby authorized to employ special agents or examiners, who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"Any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to a point in another State, Territory, District of Columbia, or foreign country shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, regulation, or other limitation of any character whatsoever, shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed; and any such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company so receiving property for transportation from a point in one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to a point in another State or Territory, or from a point in a State or Territory to a point in the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or for transportation wholly within a Territory shall be liable to the lawful holder of said receipt or bill of lading or to any party entitled to recover thereon, whether such receipt or bill of lading has been issued or not, for the full actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, notwithstanding any limitation of liability or limitation of the amount of recovery or representation or agreement as to value in any such receipt or bill of lading, or in any contract, rule, regulation, or in any tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any such limitation, without respect to the manner or form in which it is sought to be made, is hereby declared to be unlawful and void: Provided, however, That if the goods are hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means, and the carrier is not notified as to the character of the goods, the carrier may require the shipper to specifically state in writing the value of the goods, and the carrier shall not be liable beyond the amount so specifically stated, in which case the Interstate Commerce Commission may establish and maintain rates for transportation, dependent upon the value of the property shipped as specifically stated in writing by the shipper. Such rates shall be published as are other rate schedules: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under the existing law: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to provide by rule, contract, regulation, or otherwise a shorter period for giving notice of claims than 90 days, and for the filing of claims for a shorter period than four months, and for the institution of suits than two years: Provided, however, That if the loss, damage, or injury complained of was due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damage in transit by carelessness or negligence, then no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery.

"The common carrier, railroad, or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company on whose line the loss, damage, or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage, or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property, as may be evidenced by any receipt, judgment, or transcript thereof."

SEC. 2. That the act to regulate commerce as amended be further amended by inserting therein two new sections, to be designated sections 20a and 20b, respectively, to be placed after section 20 and before section 21, to read as follows:

"SEC. 20a. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1915, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier railroad corporation subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, to issue any stock, bond, or other evidence of interest in or indebtedness of the carrier (hereinafter collectively termed "securities"), or to assume any obligation for the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation—

"(a) Unless it be for some purpose within its corporate powers, and for the construction, extension, enlargement, betterment, or equipment of its railroad and facilities used or to be used in its business as a common carrier or some common carrier line comprised or to be comprised in the transportation system of which it forms a part, or the payment or refunding of valid indebtedness, or for the reimbursement of its treasury or the treasury of any company forming a part of its transportation system of moneys temporarily advanced from its earnings to accomplish the purposes herein specified, or for the lawful acquisition of the property of or interest in another common carrier corporation, or for the protection or improvement of property heretofore acquired not connected with its business as a common carrier if such last-named expenditure will not injuriously affect the public interest nor impair the ability of the corporation to perform its public service as a common carrier; and

"(b) Unless and until, and then only to the extent that, upon application by the carrier and after investigation by the commission of the purposes and uses of the proposed issue and the proceeds thereof, or of the proposed obligation, the commission shall find the same to be in compliance with the aforesaid provisions and reasonably necessary or appropriate for the purposes stated in said application, and if the commission so finds it shall issue and deliver to the carrier a certificate setting forth its findings, and thereupon the carrier may make such issue or issues of securities or assume such obligation and secure the same by mortgage, pledge, or otherwise, as it may deem appropriate and as the commission may approve.

"None of said securities or obligations hereby authorized, or the proceeds therefrom, shall be used for any purpose other than as set forth in the application of the carrier, without the consent of the commission thereto first obtained.

"The commission shall have power either to fix a minimum price below which said securities shall not be sold or disposed of or said obligations entered into by the carrier, or to require said securities to be offered for sale on competitive bidding, and to make such other rules and regulations relating to the sale or disposition of said securities, or entering into said obligation, and not inconsistent with this act, as in its judgment may be for the best interests of the carrier and the public; and in issuing the certificate aforesaid it may include its order in that behalf.

"Each such application shall be made in such form as the commission may from time to time determine and prescribe, and shall set forth such matters as the commission may require, including:

"First. (a) The total amount of proposed issue, and how authorized by or on behalf of the carrier.

"(b) The number, amount, and kind of all of its securities outstanding at the date of such application, the amount thereof then undisposed of, and whether such amount is held in the treasury of the corporation unincumbered or pledged, and if pledged, the terms and conditions of such pledge.

"(c) The number, amount, and kind of securities then to be issued, and whether to be sold, pledged, or held in the treasury of the corporation unincumbered, or otherwise disposed of or applied, as the case may be, specifying number, amount, and kind in each case; if any such securities are to be sold, the terms and conditions of sale; if any part of the consideration to be received therefor is other than money, an accurate and detailed description of such consideration; if any such securities are to be pledged, the terms and conditions of pledge; or if other disposition or application is to be made, a full and detailed explanation thereof.

"(d) The number, amount, and kind of its securities so authorized, but not then to be issued.

"(e) If the issue is of shares of stock, the number thereof, the face or par value thereof, if any, specifying whether common or preferred, and the number and kinds of then outstanding shares previously issued.

"Second. The preferences or privileges granted to the holders of any such securities; the dates of maturity, rates of interest, or fixed dividend, whether cumulative or not, and any conversion rights granted to the holders thereof, and the price, if any, at which any such securities may be retired or redeemed.

"Third. The purposes to which the proceeds of the issue are to be devoted, in such detail as the commission may require.

"Fourth. In case of proposed assumption of any obligation or liability in respect of the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, like showing shall be made as to the financial condition of said other person, as also of the objects sought and benefits to be realized by the carrier from such assumption, to be accompanied by copies of any agreements or contracts therefor.

"Every such application, as also every certificate of notification hereinafter provided for, shall be made out under oath, signed, and filed on behalf of the carrier by its president, a vice president, auditor, comptroller, or other executive officer having knowledge of the matters therein set forth and duly designated for that purpose by the carrier.

"Whenever any securities set forth and described in any such application or certificate of notification as pledged or held unincumbered in the treasury of the carrier shall, subsequent to the filing of such application or certificate, be sold, pledged, repledged, or otherwise disposed of by the carrier, such carrier shall, within 30 days after such sale, pledge, repledge, or other disposition, file a certificate of notification to that effect, setting forth therein all such facts as are required by subdivision (c) of the foregoing first paragraph, or as may be required by the commission.

"Upon such application, the commission shall cause notice thereof to be given to the railroad commission or public service or utilities commission, or other appropriate authority, of each State in which the applicant carrier operates, which State authorities shall have the right to appear before the commission and be heard upon such application. The commission may hold such hearings as it deems advisable.

"The commission is hereby authorized to make and put in force all proper rules and regulations pertaining to such application and investigation, and shall likewise have power from time to time to authorize a change of the purpose for which the proceeds of such securities or obligations, or any part thereof, may be used: Provided, That such different purpose be one which might have properly been included in an original application.

"To enable the commission to make such investigation and findings, it is authorized to employ such experts and other assistants as may be necessary, and to appoint examiners, who shall have authority to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and take testimony.

"Nothing herein shall be construed to imply any guaranty or obligation as to such issues on the part of the United States.

"The foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to notes to be issued by any said carrier maturing not more than two years after the date thereof and aggregating not more than 5 per cent at any time of the securities of said carrier then outstanding. Within 30 days after the issue of such notes the carrier shall file with the commission a certificate of notification thereof, in such form as may from time to time be determined and prescribed by the commission.

"The commission shall require periodical or special reports from all carriers hereafter issuing any securities, including such notes, or entering into any obligations as aforesaid, which shall show, in such detail as the commission may require, the disposition thereof and the application of the proceeds therefrom.

"It shall be unlawful for any common carrier railroad corporation subject to the act to regulate commerce as amended, even though permitted by the authority creating such company, to acquire by lease, purchase, or otherwise any interest in any railroad, boat line, or electric line, or any stock, or any of the securities of any corporation or association owning, controlling, or operating the same, unless the commission, upon application and hearing, shall find that the acquisition will not impair the ability of either of said carriers to perform its service to the public as a common carrier: Provided, That such finding shall not affect the legality of such acquisition under the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

"Any violation or proposed violation of this section may be enjoined in a suit in equity brought by the commission in any district court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and any person who knowingly aids, abets, or procures any such violation shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"The term 'common carrier railroad corporation' as used in this section shall not be construed to include street railway lines or electric interurban lines unless they form a part of a railroad system operated in part with steam.

"SEC. 20b. That it shall be unlawful for any officer or director of any such carrier to receive for his own benefit, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value in respect of the negotiation, hypothecation, or sale by the carrier of any securities issued or to be issued by said carrier or to participate in the making or paying of any dividends of an operating carrier except from its profits or surplus. Any person who knowingly violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction in any United States court having jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when I was interrupted last evening by the recess I was endeavoring to show that the words "unfair competition" present a rule of law adequate to meet all the demands of the law which requires a legislative declaration to state a rule of conduct that can be observed by the people upon whom it is to operate.

I desire this morning to recapitulate very briefly the course of my argument yesterday afternoon. In beginning, I ask Senators to carefully discriminate between the law and the instrumentalities which are provided for its enforcement. I desire to argue this disputed proposition for the time being without any reference to the existence of a commission. I will come to that later.

I want Senators to look at the question precisely as though no commission were proposed in the bill, just as though Congress were declaring that "unfair competition" is unlawful and that the law is to be enforced through the Department of Justice in precisely the way in which the antitrust act of 1890 is enforced. The two things are wholly separate and distinct. Congress must declare the law, must declare the rule by which the conduct of people subject to law is to be guided. When we come to the method of enforcing the law, of compelling obedience to it, then other questions arise; and I fear that the apprehension that some Senators have with regard to the validity of the provisions in this bill relating to the commission have colored somewhat their views and opinions with respect to the adequacy of the law itself.

The broad, general objection to the words "unfair competition" is that they are too vague, too indefinite, not sufficiently understood in commerce to constitute a safe and certain rule of conduct. I had called to the attention of the Senate a variety of opinions, literature, and statutes with regard to "unfair competition," in the hope that it would be manifest that the world has reached a conclusion with regard to the meaning of the words "unfair competition," and that neither court nor commission in applying these words to the affairs of men would be at liberty, as some one has suggested here, to use its own peculiar economic or social opinions with regard to the character of the conduct under examination. One Senator has gone so far as to say that the words "unfair competition" would leave a court at liberty to denounce any conduct which, in the opinion of the court, was unethical or un-Christian or unneighbor like. I feel sure that a review of the matters that I have already brought to the attention of the Senate will disabuse the mind of any candid person of that view.

I have also called to the attention of the Senate one decision, a very prominent decision, the leading case in all the English authorities, with regard to the construction of the phrase "restraint of trade." I did so in order to show that that phrase was vastly more uncertain and vague than the phrase "unfair competition." I called the attention of the Senate to the minority opinion in the case of Mogul Steamship Co. against McGregor on account of its value as a discussion of the meaning of "unfair competition." I have also called to the attention of the Senate the opinion of the majority of the court—I am now speaking of the Queen's Bench Division—in order to show what restraint of trade actually means in the common law as declared by the judges and courts of Great Britain.

I repeat, without again reading from either of these opinions, that restraint of trade, in order to be illegal under the common law and in Great Britain at the present time, must be a restraint of trade injurious to the public welfare. Such is the test presented by the phrase "restraint of trade;" and the courts of Great Britain sustain contracts which in our country would be denounced instantly by the ordinary mind as in restraint of trade unless the charge is accompanied by proof that the contract or arrangement or combination is actually detrimental to the public welfare. It was so held in the case of Mogul Steamship Co. against McGregor; and I beg to read, in addition to the facts that I stated yesterday, the communication that was issued by the combination known as the Conference Steamship Companies which constituted the basis of the suit in that instance:

SHANGHAI, May 11, 1885.

Referring to our circular dated 10th May, 1884, we beg to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other nonconference steamers, at any of the ports in China or at Hongkong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six monthly periods in which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines.

As a result of that communication this particular plaintiff was entirely deprived of trade between China and the ports of Europe, but the court in this case held that it was not sufficiently shown that this combination, which was intended to restrict and which did restrict through a rebate to the shipper, business to the conference steamers, so called, was any foundation for a civil action; that there could be no recovery of damages because it was not shown to be detrimental to the public welfare.

As I remarked yesterday, I would be very glad if the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] were here in order that he might see the beautiful certainty of the common law, where everything is fixed and plain and easy of understanding, according to his view of that foundation of our own jurisprudence. The fact is that when we commit to a court, as they have committed in England, and as I shall show they commit here under the recent decisions or opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the duty of determining whether a particular act or series of acts is prejudicial to the public interest, is opposed to the public welfare, we have committed to that tribunal the vaguest and the most uncertain rule of law ever announced for human guidance, because, in order to determine whether a particular arrangement prejudices the public interests, the judicial officer who is called upon to decide the question must bring into use his own view of social welfare, his own economic doctrine with regard to the proper adjustment of commerce and industry.

There could be no more indefinite rule submitted for the conduct of mankind than to say that whatsoever restraint of trade is injurious to the public interest is unlawful and whatsoever restraint of trade is not injurious to the people is lawful.

Now, let us look for a moment from the decision to which I have just referred to the opinion of the Supreme Court in the tobacco case or the Standard Oil case, wherein it is held that the restraint of trade, in order to fall within the antitrust law, must be found to be an "undue" restraint of trade. However much we may regret it, we can not escape from the conclusion that the word "undue" as used by the Supreme Court in these decisions is exactly equivalent to the phrase "detrimental to the public welfare"; so that the law of the United States at the present time is that every restraint of trade prejudicial to the public interest is unlawful and every restraint of trade that is not prejudicial to the public interest is lawful. I think there can be abundant material found in both these opinions to sustain what I have just said as to the equivalency of the word "undue" and the phrase "prejudicial or dangerous to the public interest."

But I do not stop there. I have before me an extract from an opinion rendered in the House of Lords in February, 1914, in the case of the Northwestern Salt Co. against the Electrolytic Alkali Co., reported in Appeal Cases, 461. The report itself is not accessible, but an advance copy in pamphlet form is in the Library. I read first the statement of the facts:

In this case the appellant company, a combination of salt manufacturers, made a contract with respondent company, an outside salt manufacturer, by which respondent agreed to sell appellant 18,000 tons of salt per year for four years at a fixed price and not to produce or sell other salt. Respondent under the contract had right to repurchase part of the salt at appellant's current prices, and then to sell the salt on terms fixed by appellant.

I should like to ask any Senator who may see fit to reply to me whether in his opinion a contract of the character I have just read is or is not in violation of the act of 1890. I rather think that the popular judgment among the members of the profession is that it is clearly and obviously in violation of the antitrust act. I proceed:

This was an action for damages by appellant against respondent for breach of the contract with regard to the sales.

That is to say, one of the parties to this contract refused to perform it, and thereupon action was brought by the other to recover damages.

The court of appeals held that the contract was unenforcable because in restraint of trade.

It was the opinion, therefore, of the court of appeals that a contract of this character is in restraint of trade. The case was taken to the House of Lords, the final judicial tribunal of Great Britain, and I read first from the opinion delivered by Lord Haldane. He said:

Unquestionably the combination in question was one the purpose of which was to regulate supply and keep up prices. But an ill-regulated supply and unremunerative prices may, in point of fact, be disadvantageous to the public. Such a state of things may, if it is not controlled, drive manufacturers out of business or lower wages, and so cause unemployment and labor disturbance.

Now, mark this:

It must always be a question of circumstances whether a combination of manufacturers in a particular trade is an evil from a public point of view. The same thing is true of a supposed monopoly. In the present case there was no attempt to establish a real monopoly, for there might have been great competition from abroad or from other parts of these islands than the part which was the field of the agreement. On material questions of fact such as these the court of appeals had not the proper evidence before it.

Says the learned judge further along in his opinion:

It may be, for all that appears, that agreements of this kind were the only effective method of preventing domestic competition from being carried to a length which would ultimately prove not merely ruinous to the parties themselves, but injurious to the public, even outside that portion of it which was dependent on the prosperity of the salt-manufacturing industry. No doubt, if there were a monopoly attempted to be set up which was calculated to enhance prices to an unreasonable extent, that would, if it so appeared on the face of the contract, be ground for refusing to enforce it. But an effective attempt to set up such a monopoly so as to enhance prices can but rarely appear on the face of an agreement between two traders. Whether such an attempt is really made is almost always a question of fact. It certainly does not appear as being made on the face of the agreement in question.

It will be seen that this learned judge declared that the common law of England does not make a contract of this sort unlawful unless it is shown that the monopoly or restraint of trade which it imposed or created is injurious to the public.

I wonder that some of my learned friends in this Chamber who fear unrestricted and unlimited power do not assail such decisions as this, and do not assert that the common law, when it reposes in a court the power to declare what is and what is not for the public interest, is an invasion of the liberties of the citizen, and is establishing a judicial tyranny under which it is intolerable for free people to live.

I will read a few words further from an opinion delivered in the same case by Lord Parker. He said:

The competition between salt producers within the area covered by the agreement of September 11, 1906, either inter se or with salt producers outside this area, may have been so drastic that some combination limiting output and regulating competition within the area so as to secure reasonable prices may have been necessary, not only in the interests of the salt producers themselves, but in the interest of the public generally, for it can not be to the public advantage that the trade of a large area should be ruined by a cut-throat competition.

I should like to have some of the Senators who feel that the antitrust law of this country needs no supplement, that there is no room for additional legislation, answer and say whether they believe that the antitrust law of 1890 will finally receive the interpretation which the courts of Great Britain have now given to the common law of that country, and whether in the future the courts of the United States, under charges that a combination or conspiracy or contract in restraint of trade has been entered into, may inquire whether the performance of the contract will be injurious to the public interest, whether the suppression of the competition which the contract involves is one that will help or hurt the public, or whether it will enter into an inquiry as to the reasonableness of the prices which are fixed by the monopolistic power created by the combination or by the agreement.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, is not the doctrine to which the Senator refers the old Roosevelt doctrine that if it is a good trust it should live, and if it is a bad trust it should be exterminated?

Mr. CUMMINS. Perhaps, Mr. President. It bears a very striking resemblance to that doctrine. It may not be material to the point I am now arguing, but if we accept this interpretation of the common law then it is for the courts in each instance to say whether the monopoly which has been established is a good monopoly and helpful to the public, or whether it is a bad monopoly and destructive of the interests of the public; whether a restraint of trade established is a good restraint of trade, or whether it is an evil restraint of trade that will interfere with the welfare of the people of the land. I do not believe in the doctrine; and if that is the common law, as much as we revere this fountain of judicial wisdom, I am in favor of changing the common law in that respect.

I see that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is here; and as I listened to his argument the other day with the greatest interest, and as I feel for his judgment the greatest respect, I should like him to tell the Senate whether the word "undue," as used now in the interpretation of the antitrust law, is the equivalent of "injurious to the public welfare." In other words, when our Supreme Court says that a restraint of trade is not prohibited unless it is an undue restraint, does that mean the same thing as declared in the opinion of the House of Lords to which I have just referred, when the judge there used the words "injurious to the public welfare"?

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, "restraint of trade" or "attempt to monopolize" at common law carries with it the proposition that it is detrimental to the public. This is the very essence of these terms. At common law a contract in restraint of trade, as, for example, where a man contracted not to carry on his business in a given locality, was nonenforceable, because it was injurious to himself and injurious to the public. Monopoly was also forbidden, because it was injurious to the public, in that it restrained the whole people from carrying on a trade and conferred it upon a single individual or corporation. Hence we find in contracts in restraint of trade and in attempts to monopolize that the essence of the offense is injury to the public.

If that is not the criterion, I should like to have the Senator from Iowa tell me what criterion he would adopt in determining what is restraint of trade and what is monopoly within the Sherman Act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident, from the answer just made by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, that he does regard the word "undue," as now interpolated into our statutes, as the equivalent of the phrase "injurious to the public welfare."

Mr. COLT. If I may answer the Senator—and then I will not interrupt him further—he has asked me with respect to "undue" restraint of trade under the Sherman law. Why, Mr. President, if you take the words "contracts in restraint of trade" of that statute in their literal sense, the law is absolutely nonenforceable. Every partnership, every one of the ordinary transactions in trade and commerce, is in its essence a restraint of trade. Further, every act of competition may be said to be in restraint of trade. Competition is a race, a rivalry. It is a struggle for existence, and successful competition means the defeat of a rival in trade. Why, not to qualify "restraint of trade" by "undue" or by the great law of reason, by which the law has always been adjusted to human transactions, would make the Sherman Act nonenforceable.

The Senator may forget that it is easy enough to frame a law, but that the judges have to apply that law to life. They have to apply it to human transactions. The problem is to bring the law into harmony with custom. The great forces which move and give direction to the life of a people are beyond the control of legal rule. The laws must advance toward the conceptions of right, justice, public policy, and economic policy which the great body of business men of the country believe in. Therefore "undue" or "unreasonable" cover principles which lie at the basis of all adjustments of fixed rules of law to civilization and to progress, and they must, by inference, at least, be inserted in every statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island has just stated a truism or a series of truisms. It unquestionably is difficult to apply any law to the manifold interests of the United States or any great country, but I am now discussing the question of the certainty of a rule of conduct, and we have reached this conclusion, that the antitrust law prohibits those restraints of trade which are injurious to the public welfare, as believed by the court which administers the law.

I do not say whether there is any method of escape from reposing that power in the courts or not. It is not material for the purposes of my inquiry. Everything must be determined by the rule of reason. The rule of reason is just as imperative and obligatory upon the Senate of the United States as it is upon any court. The rule of reason commands every human being in all his conduct and all his relations to his fellow men. It is the rule of reason invoked by the British courts through which they have reached the conclusion that there is no illegal restraint of trade that is not injurious to the public welfare; and it is for each judge to determine, as he comes to consider the case, under the rule of reason, whether or not the particular act or contract or combination is injurious to the public welfare.

Mr. President, when we have laid down a rule of that kind, when it is of acknowledged constitutionality, when we are applying it every day in our courts, how vain is it, how futile is it, to assert that the rule contained in the words "unfair competition" gives to the courts or commission a guide which they will be unable to apply to these same affairs of men.

Why, Mr. President, the two contracts which I have read and which were passed upon in the two cases to which I have referred are obviously restraints of trade. They are declared by the courts——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator was referring to the Australian case or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I have been reading from two cases; one the case of Mogul Steamship Co. against McGregor, decided some 20 years ago in Great Britain, and which is the leading case upon the subject, and the other a case recently decided in the House of Lords, I think, in February of this year.

Mr. COLT. I simply desired to state that I do not quite agree with the Senator's proposition that if the courts found a contract to be in restraint of trade, then it was simply their own rule of reason as to whether or not it was detrimental to the public. The question of being detrimental to the public would turn upon whether it was detrimental to the producer, to the consumer, to the wage earner; all those facts, and perhaps others, being taken into consideration in determining whether the given contract was detrimental to the public.

In Australia they framed their recent law after the Sherman Act, but they put in a provision that a contract in restraint of trade must be to the detriment of the public. Under that statute the courts examine the facts from every standpoint to determine whether the contract is detrimental to the public, and in a recent case a contract in restraint of trade was upheld because it was found not to be detrimental to the public While the court held the contract to be in restraint of trade it declared that it was not such a restraint of trade as to be injurious to the public.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, nevertheless the rule of reason must be gathered by the judge. It must be the rule of reason as he understands it and as he applies it to the welfare of the people whose laws he is administering.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Iowa misapprehends the issue that was involved in the Mogul Steamship case. I quote the following from the opinion of Lord Hennen, which contains a clear statement of the issues involved in that case. Here is what he states:

> It was contended that the agreement between the defendants to act in combination which was proved to exist was illegal as being in restraint of trade. I think that it was so, in the sense that it was void, and could not have been enforced against any of the defendants who might have violated it. (Hilton v. Eckersley.) But it does not follow that the entering into such an agreement would, as contended, subject the persons doing so to an indictment for conspiracy, and I think that the opinion to that effect expressed by Crompton, judge, in Hilton against Eckersley is erroneous.
> The question, however, raised for our consideration in this case is whether a person who has suffered loss in his business by the joint action of those who have entered into such an agreement can recover damages from them for the injury so sustained. In considering this question it is necessary to determine upon the evidence what was the object of the agreement between the defendants and what were the means by which they sought to attain that object. It appears to me that their object was to secure to themselves the benefit of the carrying trade from certain ports. It can not, I think, be reasonably suggested that this is unlawful in any sense of the word. The object of every trader is to procure for himself as large a share of the trade he is engaged in as he can. If, then, the object of the defendants was legitimate, were the means adopted by them open to objection? I can not see that they were. They sought to induce shippers to employ them rather than the plaintiffs, offering to such shippers as should during a fixed period deal exclusively with them the advantage of a rebate upon the freights they had paid. This is, in effect, nothing more than the ordinary form of competition between traders by offering goods or services at a cheaper rate than their rival.

Now, under the antitrust law we have not a right of action in such cases. It was not a right given by the common law. In section 8 of the antitrust law we have provided that whoever is injured in his trade or business by any such monopoly or combination in restraint of trade can bring an action and recover triple damages. That is a statutory right which is not contained in the common law of England, and, in my opinion, the issue as stated by Lord Hennen here does not sustain the point the Senator tries to make from it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Minnesota misunderstands the point I was endeavoring to make.

Mr. NELSON. Probably I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was endeavoring to show that under the common law as administered in Great Britain it was necessary to establish the fact that restraint of trade was prejudicial to the public interest before it became unlawful under the common law, and there is nothing in that portion of the opinion of Lord Hennen just cited that in the slightest degree impairs the soundness of my conclusion as stated.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly that there was no action at common law under these circumstances. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] yesterday stated that there was an action at common law for unfair competition. There was no such action. There is no such action at this time for unfair competition in the sense in which we are using that term. I have the opinion from one of the English courts and two opinions from the Federal courts of the United States so holding, but I do not regard that question as material to the point I am discussing.

I am simply trying to show that the guide or standard which is declared in the antitrust act, namely, restraint of trade as interpreted in the English court and as now interpreted in our own courts is more uncertain, less known, less capable of definite application, than is the phrase "unfair competition." I am not attempting to persuade the Senate that the Supreme Court of the United States is either right or wrong in its interpretation of the law. I am simply using the law as it has now been laid down everywhere as a standard by which to measure the competency or adequacy of the words "unfair competition."

I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. In the Mogul case the issue turned upon such unfair competition as would be in restraint of trade. One of the companies there had been practicing certain things that were regarded——

Mr. CUMMINS. I read the entire statement of the case from the report itself yesterday, and it is now in the RECORD.

Mr. COLT. That case held that the difference between fair and unfair competition at common law was this: That unfair competition included acts that were tainted with fraud, misrepresentation, intimidation, conspiracy, such acts as the ordinary mind would regard as unlawful, and that everything else was fair competition. The court said it was not speaking of morals or good manners, but of the line between fair and unfair competition at common law.

Now, one word more and I will not interrupt the Senator again. The beauty about the rule of reason is that it enables the law to change as society changes. The beauty about the rule of reason is that a contract which might be held in restraint of trade to-day would not necessarily be a contract which would be held in restraint of trade 15 years from now. The beauty about the rule of reason is that if the Supreme Court had before them the case of the fruit growers of California and a contract or an agreement which on its face was manifestly in restraint of trade—if they found that this agreement was beneficial to the small fruit grower as well as the large fruit grower, was beneficial to the producer as well as to the consumer, and if they further found that it did not result in an unreasonable enhancement of prices, which is the very essence of monopoly, that agreement, within the law of reason, should stand; and the same would be true in the case of agreements between the Kentucky tobacco growers.

It is by invoking this rule of reason that this great fundamental Sherman statute is made adjustable to the progress and the moral ideas of the American people.

Sometimes, Mr. President, we do not think what competition really means. Adam Smith laid down a wrong rule when he spoke about "free competition between equal industrial units." The difficulty with that proposition is that it is free competition between unequal industrial units; and right here you meet with the great law of nature, the most difficult law for any society or Government to overcome, that the Almighty created men of unequal capacity and energy, unequal physically, mentally, and morally; and it follows that if you do not allow these unequal industrial units some method of combining together whereby the strong will protect the weak, then the result is cutthroat competition, the most disastrous thing which can happen to any society.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sincerely grateful to the Senator from Rhode Island. He has just made the most persuasive argument in favor of the proposition I am endeavoring to maintain that I have heard upon this floor. If the rule of reason—and I am not quarreling with the rule of reason, because it must prevail everywhere—if the rule of reason is used to interpret the phrase "restraint of trade," likewise will the rule of reason be used to interpret the phrase "unfair competition."

I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that what may have been restraint of trade 50 years ago may not be considered restraint of trade now. I agree with him that what was harmless and innocent under the conditions of a half century ago may have become vitally harmful and injurious to the commerce of the people of this country now, and therefore when the courts take the phrase "unfair competition" they will apply it according to the rule of reason.

I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not forget that I am not attempting to discuss or determine what the antitrust law ought to mean. I am only attempting to enforce this one thought upon the Senate and upon the people, and that is that if the antitrust law furnishes a rule of conduct capable of application in the courts, so does the phrase "unfair competition" furnish a rule of conduct equally capable of application.

I repeat what I said yesterday, that for myself, having been a somewhat close student of this subject for many years, I understand what unfair competition means much better than I understand what restraint of trade means. If I were applying the law, I would find it less difficult to characterize specific conduct as unfair competition than I would in characterizing other conduct as restraint of trade, for the field of investigation is narrower. It is not necessary to consider such broad, sociological, industrial conditions and consequences as are necessary in determining whether a particular contract or combination is in restraint of trade.

I might well pause now in the establishment of this particular proposition, for the Senator from Rhode Island has in his eloquent and his forcible way, I am sure, removed every doubt that has been lingering in the minds of Senators with regard to the adequacy of this phrase as a rule of conduct, interpreted, as it will be and as it must be, by the rule of reason. It is the effort to ascertain and make efficient the underlying principle which this phrase is intended to express. But inasmuch as the entire country will not have the benefit of what has just been said, I desire to go one step further and apply other instances.

In the New York Penal Code, article 54, section 580, I find the following:

> If two or more persons conspire to commit any act injurious to trade or commerce * * * each of them is guilty of a misdemeanor.

This is a rule which has been repeatedly affirmed in the courts of New York. I suggest that a collection of the cases passing upon and applying this statute will be found in Bender's Penal Law and Criminal Code of 1914, under section 580, at page 116.

But that is not all. I beg to call to the attention of the Senate an article which is found in the Bulletin of the American Association of Commerce and Trade, founded in 1903 by American citizens for the promotion of commerce and trade, published in the number of June of the present year. It is entitled "Unfair competition." I read the first paragraph, but will not read more:

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

> Unfair trading or unfair competition and the contest against this peril to honest trade is of recent date; not that a century ago there were no unfair business men, but the inventions of later times have revolutionized trade conditions. Formerly the firms of the country could be sure to monopolize the domestic market, and, to a certain extent, the city, which trade belonged to the firms of the city. Now the entire world is almost like one great city. Salesmen from America can reach England within five days, telegraph and telephone minimize the distance between the countries, railroad and shipping transport goods in as many days now as months were required little more than half a century ago. This, of course, has served to intensify competition where it does not create it.
> Competition in itself is not at all unfair. Far from it. Competition is good and necessary. Competition makes for progress and perfection. Notwithstanding the money spent in advertising and soliciting, competition has contributed to the lowering of prices, because it creates a market and a demand. Competition may be sharp and unscrupulous, but there is a limit where mere competition ends and brutality and robbery begin. That is what has been called unfair trading.

I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks the entire article from which I have just read an extract, as well as an article upon the same subject in a publication of the same association in the July number, and in this connection I desire to insert as a part of my remarks the opinion of Lord Esher in the case of the Mogul Steamship Co. against McGregor, to which I have referred and from which I have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just one more reference upon this subject and I will have finished. I read from an article, entitled "The Standard of Reason versus Restraint of Trade," published in the Law Magazine and Review, of London, No. 371, February, 1914. The article is by Mr. C. A. Hereshoff-Bartlett. He says, at page 199:

> Several of the United States have adopted laws providing that any person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in the business of buying milk, cream, or butter fat for manufacture, or poultry, eggs, or grain for sale or storage, that shall, for the purpose of creating a monopoly or destroying the business of a competitor, discriminate by purchasing such commodities in one section or locality at a higher price than they pay for the same articles in another section or locality, is liable to fine or imprisonment. Thus Minnesota has confined her law to the purchase of milk, cream, and butter fat; Iowa has extended it so as to include poultry, eggs, or grain; while South Dakota has made the first determined radical advance by not limiting the discrimination to the purchase of specified commodities, but embracing the sale of any commodity in general use. * * * These laws are aimed at unfair competition in trade, and come within the general constitutional power of the State.

Again, at page 201, the same author says:

> The right to compete in any legitimate business in lawful ways and by lawful means is sacred and can not be interfered with, but this right to compete in business does not justify unfair competition.

I shall pursue this subject no further, Mr. President, for I feel that there can no longer be doubt with respect to the sufficiency of the declaration, the sufficiency of the law. Whether it is wise to make unfair competition unlawful is another question. I have not heard it questioned during this debate that we ought to make unfair competition unlawful in order to preserve in full strength and vigor the force which we all desire to preserve, namely, full, free, and fair competition in the business of the United States.

I now pass to the second division, properly speaking, of the argument. We now have the law declared by Congress. It is the will of Congress that it shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, association, or corporation to indulge in or to practice unfair competition.

The next question is, How shall that law be enforced? Here we approach the very much disputed proposition as to the propriety and constitutionality of a commission, for, I repeat, that the commission has no other office in the proposed legislation save to assist in the enforcement—in the application—of the law. The inquiry naturally arises, How can it assist, how can it help, in the enforcement of the law upon which we have now passed, upon which, I think, we are nearly all agreed?

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] finds in the proposed legislation either a delegation of judicial power or a delegation of legislative power. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber, for I would be glad if he could hear what I am about to say. The Senator declares—and with his general declarations I have no quarrel whatever; they are absolutely sound—that the ascertainment of the fact of the violation of the law is a judicial function; that the declaration of what rule shall guide a particular person or corporation in its future conduct is a legislative function. In both those propositions every lawyer must concur.

This bill does not propose to invest the commission with any legislative power. The commission will not exercise any quasi-legislative authority; it will not under any circumstances or any conditions prescribe what a person or a corporation shall in the future do; it will not attempt to declare in what practices one engaged in commerce may in the future indulge. Its sole function is to determine the fact whether a given practice, a given method, is unfair competition.

The Senator from Utah in his analysis of the interstate-commerce law entirely overlooked one of the most important and vital differences between the jurisdiction which the Interstate Commission exercises now and the jurisdiction which it exercised prior to 1906. I agree with him that under the law of 1906, when the Interstate Commerce Commission comes to prescribe a rate which shall be charged by the common carriers in the future it is exercising a legislative function; such a legislative function, however, as the Supreme Court has declared may be delegated to a tribunal of that character. The commission proposed in this bill does not perform any such office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND entered the Chamber.

Mr. CUMMINS. I note that the Senator from Utah is now here, and I beg to remind him that there is nothing in this bill which attempts to give to the trade commission the power to say to any person or to any corporation "You must do so and so in the future." Its only power is to declare the legality of an act already committed or the commission of which is threatened and concerning which the commission is given the power to institute proceedings that will arrest the performance of the act, or to condemn the act as unlawful, and to require that it shall no longer be committed.

I return to the interstate-commerce law. Prior to 1906, under a decision rendered in the Supreme Court in 1897—a decision with which every lawyer is familiar and from which I need not read, because it formed the basis of the long campaign for the amendment of the interstate-commerce law that began in 1897 and culminated in the amendment of 1906.

The law, as construed by the Supreme Court in 1897, gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission a certain power with respect to railway or common-carrier rates. What was that power? The power was to compare the rate actually charged by the carrier with the law which provided that no carrier should charge an unreasonable rate and to announce its finding; namely, to make the inquiry, Is the rate charged by the carrier in conformity with the law, or is it in violation of the law? Is it a reasonable rate, or is it an unreasonable rate? And if unreasonable, to condemn it. The commission during the whole period from 1887 to 1896 exercised precisely that power and that jurisdiction. It denounced a rate as unlawful, as contrary to the law, because it was unreasonable and because the law had prohibited the carrier from charging more than a reasonable rate; but further than that it could not go, and its attempt to go further was checked and overthrown in the decision to which I have referred, delivered in 1897.

This power was exactly the same as the power which we seek to confer upon the trade commission, namely, the power to compare an act of a corporation or of a person with the law and declare whether it is in conformity or in harmony with the purpose of Congress as found in the statutes. So, we find in the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a jurisdiction which was affirmed in repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, an authority precisely the same as we are now attempting to confer upon the commission.

I rather agree with the Senator from Utah that if we were to attempt to go further in this act and to give the commission the authority to prescribe a code of rules governing the conduct of the business men of this country for the future, we would clash with the principle that we can not confer upon the commission in that respect legislative authority; but we have not made any such attempt as that, and no one proposes any attempt of that sort. We propose to give to the commission in this bill precisely the same quality, the same kind of authority that we gave to the President of the United States with regard to the administration of the tariff law, and whose action was the foundation of the suit in the case of Field against Clark in One hundred and forty-third United States. There we prescribed a statute governing the introduction of imports into the United States, but at the same time provided that if the President of the United States should find that the laws of any particular country governing the admission of our exports into that country were not reciprocally equal and fair and just, then another schedule of duties should prevail with regard to imports of certain articles into this country.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. The Senator from Iowa is discussing a very interesting phase of this subject, and I should like to have him illustrate what would be the mode of procedure of the proposed commission from a practical standpoint. I have understood that the framers of this provision in a general way defined "unfair competition" to this extent: They have said that all the practices which the courts of the United States under the Sherman Act have found to be unfair as set forth in the decrees of the courts are instances of unfair competition.

In other words, taking a practical illustration, I should suppose, from the intent of the framers of this provision as outlined in their speeches, that the proposed trade commission would at once, if you please, prepare a circular setting out the various practices which have been laid down by the courts as unfair under the Sherman Act; that such circular would be sent to the different corporations of the country engaged in interstate commerce, and that the commission would say, "These practices and all similar practices are 'unfair competition' within the intent of this law." I would like to ask the Senator if that is the purpose of the act? In other words, if you drift away from the common law, under which there must be some element of fraud, and enter the field of what is popularly called "unfair competition," what would any business man think if he should get a circular setting out all these unfair practices, running up into the hundreds perhaps, and then stating in effect that this list is not complete because the business men can invent a great many more of such practices? I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks it is fair by the commission or fair by the courts to undertake to apply to the business of this country the rule of law that each one of these different trade transactions—for instance, in one case I notice it was forbidden to send out samples of goods to purchasers in excess of the value of 5 per cent of their purchases—is going to be unlawful under the term "unfair competition"? Are the courts or is the proposed trade commission going to be asked to apply such a standard to the business affairs of this great country? I merely ask what method would be employed by the proposed trade commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can readily perceive now the source of the opposition of the Senator from Rhode Island to this section, for if he has been under the impression that we are about to confer upon a commission the authority to do the thing which he has just described or to command it to do the thing which he has just mentioned, his objection is obvious and is sound.

Why, Mr. President, if I thought that the commission which we hope to create would sit down and attempt to write out an instruction to the business men of this country as to the things they could lawfully do and the things which it would be unlawful for them to do, there is no power that could induce me to favor it. It is absurd; it would be in the highest degree subversive of all the principles of government for any department to do what has just been suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, and I assure him, first, that it is not the purpose of those who are favoring this bill that any such course shall be pursued. Such a course would be just as intolerable to those who are trying to maintain this section as it is to those who are opposing the section.

Secondly, there is not the vestige of authority given in the section to the commission to do any such things as has just been mentioned by the Senator from Rhode Island. The commission is authorized to inquire into these practices in any given case, and if it believes that the law which we enact—namely, that unfair competition is unlawful—is being violated, it calls the offender before it upon a complaint, and there it investigates, in the presence of the offender, the charge of unfair competition.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I am only seeking light. I should like to ask the Senator how the court would determine what was fair and what was unfair in trade practices? That is my inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. By applying the rule of reason.

Mr. COLT. But when you are dealing with a restraint of trade or an attempt to monopolize, you have a foundation as to what those terms mean in the common law. You have also defined in the common law the meaning of fair and unfair competition. When, however, you go beyond that, to these practices which have been held under the Sherman Act to be unfair practices, the difficulty is to know any criterion that the court would have as a guide. I mean to say that if I were on the bench I would not know by which criterion to judge the meaning of what was fair or unfair competition as contemplated by this trade commission bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Rhode Island has stated the general rule or principle more than once. It would be idle for me to attempt to enumerate all the things which I regard as unfair competition and which I think the civilized sense of commerce regards as unfair competition.

Mr. COLT. It was stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the practices that were forbidden in the decrees of the courts referred to by them were the unfair practices contemplated by this statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. In part.

Mr. COLT. I should like, if I had the time, to call attention to some of these unfair practices and to show what they are, considering each by itself, not as showing an intent to monopolize, but as showing a practice which is forbidden by this proposed law under the words "unfair competition."

The business men want to obey the law, and it should be made clear to them what the law means.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think if the Senator from Rhode Island would ask any business man whether he regarded a particular act as fair or unfair competition, he would find no doubt in the mind of the business man. Every business man recognizes the standard just as unerringly as a court would.

Mr. COLT. Would the standard in a real-estate trade, or in trading horses, be the same as the standard in a banking transaction?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it would not. Therein lies the pliability of the rule of reason; but the same principle would apply. Now, I do not say that each of the things which have been mentioned in any of the decrees which go to make up restraint of trade would separately constitute unfair competition. There the issue is quite different; but the principle of unfair competition is well established in all of these cases.

Coming back now to the constitutional point, the trade commission does just exactly what the Interstate Commerce Commission did prior to 1906, and a part of which it still does, namely, it compares the act with the law, and ascertains whether the act is in conformity with the law. Prior to 1906 it could only denounce the act as unlawful, as being a violation of the law. Since 1906 it can prescribe a rule for the future, namely, it can determine the charge that shall be made by the carrier in the future.

I repeat, however, that this bill does not attempt to confer the latter phase of jurisdiction upon the trade commission, and I doubt whether we could constitutionally do it, because there is a difference between prescribing a rule for business so far as competition in commerce is concerned and prescribing a rate which a common carrier may charge for its service.

Again, we have prescribed certain rules which govern the admittance of aliens into the United States. They are complicated rules. They are more vague than the rule which we here set up for trade and commerce. How do we enforce the law? I am dealing now simply with the enforcement of the law. What instrumentalities have we employed in order to enforce the law? We have established the standard of admission into the United States so that it is theoretically true, anyhow, that everybody can understand just what the qualifications are; but when an alien presents himself at one of the ports of the United States, how do we determine whether or not he conforms to the standard which the law has created? We commit the finding of that fact to the Commissioner of Immigration, and finally to the Secretary of the Department of Labor; and there is no act that can be performed by the trade commission under this section that is more judicial in its character than the determination upon the part of the Commissioner of Immigration or the Secretary of the Department of Labor as to the admissibility of an alien; and yet it is not contended that the Commissioner of Immigration is exercising judicial powers in fitting the standard to the particular case under consideration.

Again, we have certain laws with regard to the mailability of matter offered to the United States for transportation through the mails. In some respects they are more uncertain than the words "unfair competition" possibly can be. Who determines whether a particular letter, circular, paper, periodical, or commodity offered for transportation in the mails is in accordance with the law? Who determines whether the person offering it is about to violate the law? The Postmaster General determines it, and his decision—unfortunately, as I have sometimes thought—is final. It is not reviewable in any court, and yet the act which the Postmaster General thus performs savors more of the judicial power than does any act which we authorize the commission to perform in this section.

All laws must be enforced in some manner. They are enforced in the courts to a comparatively small degree. Only a few of the instances in which the law is imposed on the individual find their way into the courts. Happily, the courts are always open to preserve the constitutional rights of the citizen. No act of Congress can deprive any citizen or any corporation of his or its constitutional protection, and within that limit we have full power and authority to confer upon the commission the jurisdiction to determine whether a particular person or corporation is guilty of unfair competition, so as further to enforce the law. Obviously, the commission can not enforce the law alone. If its finding is not heeded, it has no power, and we can confer upon it no power to coerce the individual or the corporation. Under our form of government, before the coercive hand is laid upon the citizen under such circumstances, we must invoke the processes of the courts, and the commission is given the authority in this section to appeal to the courts to render effective the order which it has entered.

I am utterly unable to perceive any unconstitutionality in the section. I have not yet discussed what effect we may give to the order of the commission. I may not do that at this time; but if not at this time, at some later time.

Further, with regard to the argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] upon the bill, I desire to say here—and I do it in no idle humor, nor do I say what I am about to say for the purpose of compliment or flattery—that there is no

Senator in this Chamber whose judgment respecting the Constitution of the United States I value more highly than that of the Senator from Utah. Whenever he declares his reflective, mature opinion upon any such question I always accept it with more than ordinary weight, and the general principles which he has announced are unassailable.

Admitting that, I approach now the only other point that the Senator made respecting the constitutionality of this bill. It refers to section 3 and involves the inquisitorial powers of the commission, the powers of investigation.

I concede at once that we can not confer upon a commission the power to investigate simply for the purpose of securing interesting or valuable information. I do not think we can confer upon a commission all the powers that Congress itself has with regard to investigation, because Congress can investigate any subject that may develop facts which may be material in determining what our legislation ought to be in the future. In my opinion, we can not confer that power upon a commission. We must limit our delegation of authority, so far as inquisition is concerned, to a subject not only upon which we have the constitutional right to legislate, but upon which we have legislated, so that the investigation is connected with the enforcement of a law.

I think the Senator's criticism of the first paragraph of section 3 is a just one, and I believe the paragraph ought to be amended.

I think we have the right to confer upon the commission the authority to investigate any person, corporation, partnership, or association in order to ascertain whether that person, corporation, partnership, or association is violating a valid law of the United States. We have regulated commerce, both in the interstate-commerce law and in the antitrust law, and any investigation which it is necessary to make in order to enforce either of those laws or any other law regulating commerce this commission has the right to make, in my judgment. I agree, however, that the investigation must be limited to the respects over which Congress has jurisdiction, and that we can not inquire of a person or corporation engaged in interstate commerce generally without limit and without purpose.

Let us see. A weakness of the argument of the Senator from Utah lies in this omission: He had in his mind, as I thought, as a test of the investigation that could be properly made by the commission, the interstate-commerce law, and his illustrations were all drawn from the interstate-commerce law; but I now put with it the act of 1890, to prevent restraints of trade and monopolies. It also is a regulation of commerce, and we may investigate anything which pertains to a corporation engaged in interstate commerce and which relates to any effort, any attempt, to obstruct the channels of commerce.

I suggested to the Senator from Utah during the course of his argument that the bill which he introduced relating to the compensation of injured employees of common carriers was in itself, if constitutional, a complete refutation of the argument that he made. He was not inclined to that belief, and replied that the law substituting compensation for liability was constitutional because it affected the efficiency and the safety of transportation. So it does, and as the basis of its constitutionality, if the substitution of compensation for liability with a common carrier engaged in commerce among the States did not in some way relate to the ability of the common carrier to perform its service to the public, there would be no foundation for the legislation.

Of course the investigation proposed in the bill before us does not relate to the safety or the convenience or the efficiency of transportation, but transportation is only one of the phases of interstate commerce. Another phase is the freedom of intercourse, the preservation of independence and competition in the business of the country. The statute which we passed, and to which I have referred so often, in 1890 is a regulation of commerce because it is intended to preserve the freedom of commerce. It is intended to maintain free and fair competition in commerce, and it is just as clearly within our constitutional authority to prevent combinations, contracts, arrangements, conduct which interferes with the freedom of commerce, as it is to see to it that the instrumentalities of transportation are efficient, safe, and convenient. The two things represent different forms of the same constitutional authority. Therefore, when we come to inquire——

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not a fact that transportation is a little further removed from the source of power than commerce itself, in that transportation is but the handmaid of commerce or the agency of commerce?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am much obliged to the Senator from Alabama. The suggestion is most forcible. Commerce is the process of exchange among the people. A common carrier is but the instrumentality that effects the exchange. So to support the bill in the respects which the Senator from Utah criticized it, I bring forward the antitrust law of 1890 and the law which we now propose to enact, all of which are directed toward the same general object, namely, commerce itself, the maintenance of its independence and the preservation of its vital force, namely, rivalry—honest, reasonable rivalry—among those who are engaged in it. Therefore, when we come to determine whether these powers of investigation are properly exercised by the commission, we must remember these regulations of commerce as well as the regulations which convey the articles of commerce from one State to another.

I read paragraph (a) of section 3, upon which my learned friend commented with so much force:

(a) To investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

I think that paragraph is weak in this, that it does not contain the clause which is found in the succeeding paragraph, and which I supposed related to both paragraphs, and I think that was the general view of the committee. I will read the next paragraph in order to point the remarks I have just made:

(b) To require any corporation subject to the provisions of this act which the commission may designate to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements, and records concerning its organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, or to individuals, associations, or partnerships, and to require the production for examination of all books, documents, correspondence, contracts, memoranda—or other papers relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership, and to make copies of the same.

The words "relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged" ought to be in paragraph (a). I think they are by inference in the paragraph, but the suggestion of the Senator from Utah will lead me, if it does not lead the chairman of the committee, and I think he is equally impressed with it, to insert in paragraph (a) the same or equivalent language of paragraph (b), so that the inquiry will be limited to the commerce among the States in which the particular corporation or association may be engaged.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, what does the Senator say with reference to the concluding phrase of subdivision (b), which is, "or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership"?

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had not quite finished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The preceding part of that subdivision seems to be qualified by this language, "affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged," but it goes on and provides, "or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership," which association of course will not be, as far as the language of the subdivision is concerned, in any manner connected with interstate commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. I catch the thought of the Senator from Utah, and I do not intend to assert that the phrase is happily drawn, but I think, so far as paragraph (b) is concerned, the investigation of the relation of any such corporation to an individual, association, or partnership is necessarily limited by the preceding clause, "relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged." If it be not perfectly clear, then it ought to be made clear in that respect, and I have no doubt that the committee, under the suggestion, will do so. I have always understood that the clause that I read was a part of paragraph (a) or controlled paragraph (a) as well as paragraph (b). I see, however, that it is so separated from the first paragraph as to create some doubt in that regard, and therefore I intend, as I have said, to suggest to the committee a slight amendment in that respect, and if it does not commend itself to the committee I shall offer it upon the floor upon my own responsibility.

But that does not touch the real question, which is, Can we give the commission the power to investigate a person, partnership, or corporation engaged in commerce among the States in so far as the investigation pertains to any regulation which Congress has constitutionally made respecting commerce among the States? I affirm, without much fear of contradiction, that our power of investigation is as broad as the power which we have exercised in legislation. Whatever we have imposed as a rule of conduct is the limit of our inquiry, and it has no other limit, save the limit of the Constitution preserving the papers of individuals from unnecessary search or seizure; and that, of course, controls every act of Congress, and there is no attempt here to pass beyond it.

Mr. President, I think I have now referred to all the constitutional suggestions that were made by the Senator from Utah. I do not mean that I have embraced them all in detail, but I think what I have said is fairly expressive of my view of the principle which controls all of them. I now come for a few words to a point made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] yesterday with regard to the bill. I wish he were here.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is here.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon; he was not in his accustomed seat and I did not notice his presence. I was astonished to hear it said that this bill was intended or would have the effect of regulating monopoly instead of maintaining and preserving competition. I understand that some prejudice can be created, although that was not the purpose of the Senator from Colorado, by suggesting that the bill follows the desires or the economic views of such captains of industry as Mr. Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation, and Mr. Perkins, of the International Harvester Co., who appear to believe that the day of competition has passed and the era of complete cooperation has been ushered in. I know the mere suggestion that this bill is a compliance with the wishes and the views of these men is apt to surround it and to impregnate it with a prejudice that it is difficult to overcome. I therefore intend to take a few moments in order to show how illusory, how unfounded, how baseless a claim of that sort is.

There is a war of economic thought in progress, and a battle has been on for years between cooperation and competition. It is the old struggle between competition and socialism, in essence, for whenever we attempt to regulate monopoly, establish monopoly, and endeavor to protect the people against its assaults through regulation, the day of State socialism has dawned, for the people of this country will never tolerate any monopoly in industry save the monopoly of the Government itself.

I think I fairly comprehend the field in which the battle is being fought. I am for competition, and I am unalterably opposed to monopoly and monopolistic power in any form, to any extent, in the fields of industry. I can not but feel that either my sincerity or my intelligence is impeached when I hear it stated upon the floor of the Senate that the bill to which I have given my approval, which I have helped to compose, and for which I intend to vote is an expression of a school of thought which I have repudiated all the days of my public life.

I assert that this bill is a vigorous and honest effort to make competition stronger in its fight against monopoly. I assert—and that no one, I am sure, will question—that it is the purpose, the motive of every member of the committee who believes in the bill, to vitalize competition and to make it enduring and effective. That, however, is not enough. I assert that this will be the effect of the bill when it is carried faithfully into execution.

Let us see about the views of Mr. Gary and Mr. Perkins. I do not speak of them disparagingly. I speak of them as types of a great number of men who have reached the conclusion that we ought to abandon competition, admit monopoly, and endeavor to see that monopoly does not enforce its power unreasonably or oppressively upon the people.

It is an error to believe that this movement began with the American Tobacco Co. case or the Standard Oil case or the Northern Securities case. It is a movement that has been in progress in the United States actively for more than 15 years. It has been supported upon every rostrum; it has been exploited in every part of the United States. It is a propaganda in which many earnest and sincere, devoted friends of good government have joined. Those who think that it is of recent origin have not inquired carefully into its history.

It is true that Mr. Gary and Mr. Perkins and many others whose names I could mention if I cared to consume the time to do it have urged upon the Congress of the United States and upon the people of the United States the policy of permitting these great combinations to continue and of conferring upon some governmental function or tribunal or department the authority to curb their avarice and selfishness. It is true that they have urged upon Congress and upon the people the wisdom of permitting manufacturers—producers—to join together in agreements that will limit output, that will divide territory, that will fix prices, in order to escape what they call the devastation of competition. All this is true.

What do they propose? They recognize that these things are in violation of the antitrust law. They have urged that we create a tribunal that will be given the power to approve agreements of the character I have described, of combinations such as I have described, admittedly in violation of the antitrust law, provided the commission shall believe that the things to be done by or through the contract or through the combination will not be oppressive, will not result in the exaction of unjust or unreasonable prices for the things in which they deal.

This is the movement of the gentlemen to whom I have referred. I will not consume the time to turn to the hearings and read their testimony. No one will dispute that I have stated it with substantial accuracy. A commission or a law that would result in accomplishing the purpose that I have stated would be intolerable to me, and I believe it would be intolerable to every member of the committee. It would be founded upon the socialistic theory of permitting monopoly and of controlling it, of making it just by an order of the commission or a court.

What have we done here? We have announced a commission that is intended to strengthen the antitrust law in the first instance. Its most valuable work will be in the disocvery of offenses against the law and in rendering assistance to the courts and to the Department of Justice in the administration of the law. Not a line of the law is to be repealed. Not a principle of the law is to be overturned. It is to remain in all its vigor, untouched, unimpaired, with the additional force in administration which this commission will confer upon it.

What is the purpose of the antitrust law? Is it to permit monopoly and regulate it? Is it to permit these agreements to be made and control them? No; the purpose of the antitrust law is free, full, complete competition in the business of the United States.

How, then, can it be said that in this respect at least we are following the desires and are accomplishing the purposes of those who want to establish monopoly and then regulate it?

Further, this bill proposes to make an additional offense—unfair competition. Is the suppression of unfair competition the regulation of monopoly? Unfair competition is the antithesis of fair, free competition. Unfair competition is the pursuit of that practice which destroys competition and establishes monopoly. Unfair competition is the deadliest enemy of independence in business. Unfair competition is never employed save by those who have some degree of monopolistic power to exercise.

And yet, notwithstanding all these things, it is said that this bill is a proposal to acknowledge monopoly and regulate it. I have found no other argument, no other objection urged against the bill so difficult to hear with composure as the one to which I have just referred.

Mr. President, I am sure that upon reflection those who have allowed their minds to be filled with a suspicion of this sort will dismiss it. It has no foundation; it is but an apprehension, and it is wholly unjustifiable. Having said what I have with regard to it, I can not but refer to the platforms of the three political parties brought before the Senate yesterday.

I am not very solicitous about platforms when it comes to legislation. I shall not undertake to determine how far I am complying with any platform which any political party has ever announced. I am simply endeavoring to do what I believe to be right; to do what I believe to be for the best interests of the American people; but just a word with regard to the Progressive platform, which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] put before the Democrats of the Senate with the suggestion that they were following that platform rather than their own. It is for them to say, of course, what platform they desire to follow, and I am not a very good judge in comparing platforms; but in my opinion this legislation is in exact harmony with the Republican platform and it is in exact harmony with the Democratic platform, for I believe those two platforms on this subject are substantially alike.

I do not recognize the subject as a partisan one at all; I can not conceive that the people of the United States can be divided into political parties upon this issue; but I beg to remind the Senator from Colorado that if the Progressive platform means—and I do not say that it does—that the same powers ought to be conferred upon a trade commission as have been conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission—that is to say, the power of fixing prices for the commodities of commerce—then it is obvious that the commission proposed to be created by this bill is in direct opposition to the Progressive platform. I do not assert that is what was intended by those who met in Chicago and framed that platform; but it has been charged that the followers of the Progressive Party believe that a commission should be organized to fix the prices of commodities in commerce precisely as the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes rates to be charged by common carriers. I have heard a great many members of that party declare that it had no such meaning; that the analogy intended to be drawn was a general one, and that it was not thought that it commanded the exercise of any authority of that sort; but if it does, then it is obvious that the commission which we propose to establish here is not the commission proposed in that platform; that it is not formed in accordance with the principle of the Interstate Commerce Commission; that is to say, the trade commission is not to be organized to do the things for general industry that the Interstate Commerce Commission does for public service, for the latter commission does determine the charge to be made for the service, while the proposed trade commission not only is not to be charged with any such authority, but it is organized upon a directly opposite principle, namely, that prices shall be determined by honest competition among those who are engaged in commerce.

Mr. President, I have now covered the field which I had in mind when I rose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I have not been in the Chamber during the entire discussion of the Senator from Iowa, but I noticed that he remarked that he had canvassed all the objections made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] founded on constitutional grounds. The Senator from Utah made a very severe criticism of subdivision (b) of section 3, upon the ground that it attempted to give to the commission the power to conduct unreasonable searches and seizures, contrary to the provisions of amendment 4 of the Constitution. I do not know whether the Senator from Iowa has canvassed that in detail.

Mr. CUMMINS. I referred to that in only one aspect. The Senator from Utah claimed that these investigations or searches could not be made by a commission created by Congress, except in so far as the person or corporation was engaged in commerce and in so far as the investigation covered the commerce in which the person or corporation was engaged; and he claimed that we had not connected the power of investigation with any congressional enactment that would authorize the investigation to be made. I did not refer to the broader ground as to whether we conferred upon the commission—assuming now that the Constitution of the United States were out of the way—so far as the regulation of commerce is concerned, a power that would be in violation of that clause of the Constitution to which the Senator from Montana has just referred.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I listened to the discussion of the Senator from Iowa of the feature to which he now adverts; but, reading again the address of the Senator from Utah, I am confirmed in the opinion which I gathered in listening to him, that his criticism went far beyond that; that, even conceding the power granted by the act extended no further than to such books and papers as referred to commerce between the various States, it was still open to the constitutional objection, because, as it was expressed, it gave a roving power to require the production of books and papers.

In connection with that matter, I inquired of the Senator from Utah, in the course of his address, as to how, if at all, he discriminated between the provisions of this bill and the similar provisions found in the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH. I was not able to get any direct answer to that. I am myself unable, except in the respect to which the Senator now alludes, to distinguish between the provisions of this bill and the similar provisions found in the interstate-commerce act; and it is well known that those provisions of the interstate-commerce act have been the subject of careful inquiry by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that they have been entirely justified. Unless some difference can be pointed out between the provisions of this bill and the provisions of the interstate commerce act, we must regard the general question of power as entirely foreclosed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Montana. I suggested to the Senator from Utah that he had overlooked, as it seemed to me, the fact that the statute of 1890 and these proposed statutes are regulations of commerce, and that investigations under them and for the purpose of enforcing them were just as competent as are similar investigations made under the interstate commerce law for the purpose of enforcing that law, which relates to transportation. I think the present statement of the Senator from Montana is conclusive.

The powers proposed to be conferred upon the trade commission are no greater than the powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if they are conferred for a constitutional purpose, namely, the regulation of commerce, then the decisions which have sustained the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission necessarily will sustain a similar power granted to the commission proposed to be created in this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator pardon a further interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. In that connection, Mr. President, I simply desire to refer to the direct adjudication of the Supreme Court in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission against Brimson, reported in the One hundred and fifty-fourth United States, at page 447, in which the provision of section 12 of the interstate-commerce act, giving the commission power to require the production of books and papers, is sustained, and the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission against Baird, in One hundred and forty-ninth United States, at page 25, in which the prior decision is affirmed.

The question, then, Mr. President, it seems to me is simply as to whether this bill deals with the general subject of interstate commerce and whether the provisions of this bill in that regard are in any respects essentially different from the provisions of the interstate-commerce act. If they are, it would be wise that that difference should be pointed out by some one, so that the appropriate amendment may be made and the power granted may fall within the constitutional limits as defined in those decisions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, upon the whole I believe that the commission which we propose to create will be helpful to the people of the country; that its work will result in a more rigid and beneficial enforcement of the act of 1890. I believe that its administration of section 5 will prevent the growth and development of many a mighty power which the Government would be almost powerless to overcome if we permit it to strike its roots so deeply in the business of the United States as many a combination has now planted itself in the body of our commercial fabric.

I do not believe the bill is complete. I am not satisfied with the court procedure provided in section 5. I have offered an amendment which is now pending, which embodies my views of the proper course in the courts for the better and more complete enforcement of the section.

I believe also that there ought to be added to the bill a prohibition against a community of directors in competitive corporations, a provision which, in a somewhat emasculated and unsatisfactory form, is found in the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee. I believe there ought to be in the bill a prohibition against one corporation holding the stock of another, the two corporations being engaged in a like business. In a degree that prohibition is found in the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee, but it does not conform to my views, because, among other things, it relates only to future acquisitions of stock by corporations, and I want it to apply to existing conditions. I want a corporation that holds stock in violation of that principle to be required, within a reasonable time in a reasonable way, to dispose of it, so that we may restore competition among existing corporations, as well as to preserve it among future corporations. These things, however, will arise for discussion as we proceed with the consideration of this bill and the one which is shortly to follow.

I desire now, Mr. President, to withdraw the amendment I offered in the nature of a substitute for section 5. I do so for this reason: It embraces a matter of serious importance. While it does not concern the declarative part of the bill, it does concern the enforcement of the law which we are about to make; but I am very anxious, if possible, that the members of the committee at least shall be able to agree upon a proper procedure, upon what they regard as the most effective and the most just procedure. Hoping that before the amendment which I have offered and in which I believe thoroughly shall be voted upon we shall have an opportunity to consider it and other proposals of like character submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], I withdraw my amendment, making it clearly known, however, that in doing so I do not abandon it. I am thoroughly convinced that in substance it ought to be adopted, but I am sure the Senate wants the last and the best and the maturest judgment of the members of the committee, and if we can agree upon a proposal in that regard which we can recommend with unanimity to the Senate I doubt not that it will have weight in the conclusions to which Senators may come. Therefore, Mr. President, I renew my request for the withdrawal of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The Chair understands that a Senator has a right to withdraw an amendment which he has offered.

APPENDIX.

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

[By Dr. Paul Marcuse, attorney and counselor at law.]

Unfair trading or unfair competition and the contest against this peril to honest trade is of recent date, not that a century ago there were no unfair business men but the inventions of later times have revolutionized trade conditions. Formerly the firms of the country could be sure to monopolize the domestic market and, to a certain extent, the city, which trade belonged to the firms of the city. Now the entire world is almost like one great city. Salesmen from America can reach England within five days, telegraph and telephone minimize the distance between the countries, railroad and shipping transport goods in as many days now as months were required little more than half a century ago. This, of course, has served to intensify competition where it does not create it.

Competition in itself is not at all unfair. Far from it. Competition is good and necessary. Competition makes for progress and perfection. Notwithstanding the money spent in advertising and soliciting, competition has contributed to the lowering of prices, because it creates a market and a demand. Competition may be sharp and unscrupulous, but there is a limit where mere competition ends and brutality and robbery begin. That is what has been called unfair trading.

It is interesting to observe how unfair trading was met by the courts, when such cases began to occur regularly. English and American courts found relief in the fundamental principles of the law and applied the old law to the newly arising conditions and the decisions of the courts have embodied what may be called a code against unfair trading. The French courts also contended against unfair trading by applying section 1382 of the Code Napoleon, according to which everybody has to make good the damages he wrongfully did to another person. Not so the German courts. It is a well-known fact that the German law is written law, and that the judges are rather reluctant to adapt the law to facts which do not expressly come within the words of a certain paragraph, even if such facts were not foreseen or could not be foreseen by the legislator because they did not exist when the law was enacted. As a matter of fact the German courts usually held that competition was permissible—which is an unquestionable fact—and that, as the law of tort did not contain a clause for the protection of business or trade, there was no possibility of preventing or prosecuting unfair trade.

A relief, however, was needed and was found by enacting a special law against unfair trading. The law as originally passed in 1896 deals with four different phases of unfair trading.

(1) Falsely representing one's own business.
(2) Running down a competitor's business.
(3) The deceptive use of a firm name, trade-mark, etc.
(4) The betrayal of business secrets.

The law was successful in combating unfair trading, but as it granted relief in four specific cases only, the courts held that cases not within the law could not be prohibited. It can be imagined that ingenious heads were quick in replacing old methods by new schemes not mentioned in the law. Therefore a change of the law was advocated, moreover as some provisions seemed to require a clearer and more accentuated wording and in fact a new law was passed in 1909 which is still in operative force.

The new law deals with seven different cases of unfair trading which are preceded by a general provision prohibiting any competitive act which is "against morals." Immoral within the meaning of this law is not what a business man of high character and standing would not do, it is a breach against what decent and just people would consider repugnant. The same act may be immoral in a certain case, and moral in another; not that an immoral act can become moral for a certain line of business, because it has become customary in this branch; but a competitive act may be considered permissible against the large industrial concern and immoral against a small retail store. Among others the German courts have applied this general clause in the following cases:

(1) Libeling another business—which is more than the running down of a business, for which see below—for instance, "A. & Co. are doing a dishonest business" or "are selling absolutely worthless goods."

(2) Inducing others to break a contract, for instance, by asking a competitor's employee to break his contract with his firm or by inducing the agent to sell at lower prices than prescribed in his contract with the manufacturer. It can not be unfair, of course, to engage a clerk who is still in the service of another firm. Unfairness is only established when such advantage is sought by means of breach of an existing contract. It is not unfair either to try to buy goods as cheap as possible and thus beat the competitor on the market. There are, however, certain goods, usually sold at standard prices, such as books, certain kinds of soap, perfumery or drugs, certain makes of gloves, etc., which the manufacturer sells to a middleman under special agreement not to sell them for less than a certain price. The retailer who induces the middleman to break his contract with the manufacturer and to sell him a glove cheaper so that he can sell for 85 cents what otherwise costs $1 is considered guilty of unfair trading. Also the retailer who, being obliged to sell at a certain price, sells cheaper and is not supplied any longer by the manufacturer, and who induces other firms to sell him goods, although the manufacturer has pledged his customers not to supply him. On the other hand, it can not come within the law if, the retail prices being regulated only for the domestic trade, a domestic firm tries to get the goods from abroad at export prices and reimports them, unless, of course, the foreign firm is under contract not to sell to the manufacturers' country.

The selling at prices below the usual prices or even below the cost price (preisschleuderei), cut prices, is not unfair trade, either; the opposite question, whether it is unfair trading to charge excessive or discriminating prices, plays but a small rôle in the jurisdiction of the German courts. The reason is that almost all railroads, telegraphs, telephones, gas, electricity, street car companies, are owned by the Government or the municipalities. As to shipping, a concern which in order to discriminate against an inconvenient competitor charged prices detrimental to trade was found guilty of unfair trading, because shipping was considered a quasi monopoly. But it was not considered unfair to exclude from rebates firms which also shipped goods on other lines.

(3) While, as stated before, one may engage a competitor's employee, it is unfair to take the employee from the competitor's works for the sole purpose of causing inconvenience or expense, e. g., without the intent of giving him a place in your own factory, just paying him the salary for a week or two. It is also unfair competition to engage a competitor's clerk for one's own factory and to promise a reward for inducing the competitor's customers to buy goods from him. A firm giving a good character to an employee who was discharged for incompetency or stealing to an inquiring competitor will also be held responsible for this breach of good faith.

(4) Boycotts and lockouts are permitted; they are immoral, however, if they purport or effect the complete ruin of a competitor. Conventions between several bidders to the effect that one of them shall make a serious bid while the others do not bid or make excessive bids, for the sake of dividing the profit, are not necessarily immoral, because the prevention of mutual underbidding and competition is a goal for which business men may loyally contend. Such conventions are immoral, if they comprise every possible bidder, and if the one serious bid made is far above what is an honest and fair price.

The seven different cases of unfair trading are as follows: Falsely representing one's own business (reklameunfug); i. e., deceitful misstating the quality, source of supply, etc., of the goods in order to attract trade, whether such misstatements are made in advertisements, pamphlets, window announcements, or by the salesman or auctioneer.

Examples: "Linen collars for 8 cents," when the goods are really cotton; "patented for us," "used by the royal family," "recommended by every firm of high standing," "we sell at factory prices, or at wholesale prices," thus making people believe that they can save the profit which otherwise would go to the manufacturer" in business since 1785"; "goods damaged by fire," "we keep a larger stock than any other firms in the city," "largest output in the world," etc.

While these statements, if they are untrue, decidedly constitute unfair trading, any business man is entitled to think his goods are the best, and to praise them accordingly. Thus announcements as "perfume of unsurpassable aroma," "daintiest children's apparel," "high-grade men's clothing store," can not come within the law, even if the goods so exaggerated are only fairly average goods. Now, there is often but a slight difference between a misstatement and a glorification; "hotel in magnificent neighborhood" is one, "hotel magnificently situated in the mountains" can be the other; nor is it often easy to decide what is one thing and what is the other. The German courts hold that a statement is to be taken and taken seriously, while the glorification is not. The traveler will not be considered deceived if the neighborhood does not appeal to him, but he is deceived when he expected to find mountain scenery and hardly sees hills. It further depends upon whom such announcements are addressed to; wholesale buyers familiar with manufacturing often will not be deceived when consumers are. Fifth Avenue walkers won't believe that certain goods are indestructible, while east side customers may believe so. If a piece of china is offered as Capo di Monte for $10, the buyers in an auction house know that the piece is not real, and that the auctioneer wants to say "type Capo di Monte." The average public in a second-class store may, however, believe that the piece is real, and that they are offered an excellent opportunity of buying cheap. In the first case it would not be unfair trading; in the second it would be so. It may be added that in a village, where hardly anybody knows what Capo di Monte is, the piece can be offered as Capo di Monte, and nobody will be deceived as long as it is really worth $10.

An exceptionally interesting point is the question of the so-called designation of origin. "Waltham watch" means a standard watch made by a certain well-known factory in the city of Waltham; "swiss cheese," however, means only a cheese of a certain taste, color, and shape. Therefore any New York farmer may call the cheese he has produced "swiss cheese" (of course, not "imported Swiss cheese") as long as it looks and tastes like the type known as swiss cheese, while nobody may call his watches "Waltham watches," even if they are manufactured in Waltham and are like the original Waltham in quality and design. It is often hard to decide whether a certain name is considered a designation of origin or of type, because in many cases the name has changed from the former to the latter. Wiesbaden preserves originally meant fruit preserved in Wiesbaden in a certain fashion in bottles of a certain shape. It now means high-class preserves, preserved and bottled like the imported ones. Aachener printer, Lübecker marzipan, were cakes made by the bakers of those places in a certain shape and of a certain taste; they gained fame and now designate only types which may be made by anybody and anywhere. Buchara rugs are rugs manufactured in Buchara; Cuban cigars, cigars grown and manufactured in Cuba, so that a firm which sells as "Cuban cigars" cigars manufactured in Bremen out of Cuban tobacco leaves will be guilty of unfair trading. "Munich beer" means beer from Munich, while in Berlin "Bayrisch beer" means domestic beer having the color of light Bavarian beer. "Pilsener beer" is not yet a type of beer, but a brewery in Radeberg which is manufacturing beer of the quality and taste of Pilsen beer was allowed to call its product "Radeberger Pilsener."

The law controlling the sale of wine (weingesetz) contains similar provisions, the details of which, however, would lead too far.

The first part of this brief analysis of the law on unfair competition dealt with the so-called general clause prohibiting any competitive act against morals and with one of the seven specific cases of unfair trading mentioned in the law. We shall now consider the six remaining cases and the relief afforded by the law.

II. Sales: The announcement of a sale is a means to attract customers, expecting to find an exceptional opportunity for buying cheaply. It is a universal and standing complaint in Germany, as it was and is in America, that legitimate trade is endangered by stores continually advertising bargains or clearance sales or of others twice a year of goods bought specially or sales at 50 per cent reduced prices which before such reduction were marked up to 100 per cent. The law of unfair competition contains what may be called a "code of sales."

1. A "receiver's sale" is a sale held by a receiver; whereas a sale of goods bought of the receiver of a bankrupt firm may not be called a "receiver's sale."

2. The reasons for each and every sale must be clearly set forth in all announcements, and a list of the goods for sale must be filed with the local authorities.

3. As a sale is a disposal of stock which the owner wishes to dispose of by sale, it is illegal to take on a new stock for an intended sale or to replenish such stock during the sale. It must be admitted that the latter clause may render it difficult to dispose of the stock, as in the case of goods of various sizes, such as collars, shoes, shirt waists, etc., but it was thought better to go a little too far than not far enough.

4. "Season sales" or "inventory sales" do not come within the above provisions as long as such sales are customary and are advertised as such. Their number and duration, however, may be regulated by the local authorities.

Announcements such as "linen week" and "remnant days" do not contain the word "sale" and do not come within the law, as held by the courts. "Clearance sales" and "only a few days more," on the other hand, are synonymous with sale, and therefore the law is applicable to such announcements.

Certain goods are usually sold in standard quantities, measure, or packing, such as matches, yarn, bottled beer, and pens. It was an old trick of unfair trading to sell 75 per cent of the standard quantities at 90 per cent of the customary price, resulting, of course, in extra profit, while people were being made believe they were being offered an exceptional bargain.

The law therefore authorizes the local authorities to forbid the sale of certain classes of goods in other than the standard quantities or measures.

III. The bribing of employees: It has become customary in more than one branch of business to pay a consideration to employees of another firm for any orders placed with them. While no one would object to calling the attention of a business acquaintance to take the trouble to examine your goods and make his stay pleasant in town it has developed in certain branches that such "consideration" amounted to the employee's salary, and, furthermore, that such consideration was regarded as a matter of course. Suffice it to say that the principal has to pay a price which has been estimated to include the bribe paid to his employee.

The law provides that both the giving and acceptance of a bribe in the shape of money or extra consideration is illegal.

IV. It has already been shown that falsely representing one's own goods is illegal; so is also the false representation of a competitor's goods, as, for instance, the patent applied for by A has been denied; B. C. & E. Co.'s furnace has been blown off for lack of work. Criticism is, of course, allowed, such as D's goods are mediocre, while E sells second-class suits, would be a statement and, if falsely stated, would come under the law.

V. Firm names are protected by the commercial code. The law, however, can not cover every case that may arise. For instance, Augustus Taylor, a manufacturer of pencils in Nuremberg, will be sufficiently protected, provided no Nuremberg firm assume the firm name "Augustus Taylor"; so that the commercial code protects only the firm at the place of business; but if Augustus Taylor should be a firm well known all over the country, people might think that the firm of Augustus Taylor, of Berlin, also pencil manufacturers, is a branch of the well-known Nuremberg house and will take the Berlin Taylor's goods for goods of the Nuremberg firm. A Richard Kennedy, manufacturer of shirt waists, can not prevent another Richard Kennedy and Robert Brown from opening a competitive factory under the style of "Richard Kennedy & Co." or "Richard Kennedy & Brown." If, however, this new firm should rent the premises previously occupied by the old firm, it is clear that Richard Kennedy should be protected from losing the good will and patronage of persons patronizing the new place of business in the belief that Richard Kennedy has taken a partner. The law of unfair trading forbids the use of any deceptive firm name and, for instance, would force Richard Kennedy & Brown to adopt the firm name of Brown & Kennedy or R. Kennedy, jr. & Brown. This also applies to the law of trade-marks. A trade-mark admissible under the trade-mark law may be successfully challenged under the law of unfair trading, provided it appears that a trade-mark was adopted for deceptive purposes. Other ways to identify a business or to attract attention even better than by a trade-mark by using the name of a business, as "Monopol Hotel," "Goethe Theater," "Germania Pharmacy," all being names which are neither part of a firm name or protectable by means of a trade-mark. Fancy carriages or liveries, typical letterheads or billheads may also be recognized as belonging to the firm first using them and become known through them. The same has been held of titles of books and periodicals. A medical monthly may prohibit the use of this title by any medical journal published monthly, and may also prohibit the use of a similar cover or even print by any "medical quarterly" or "medical monthly news."

VI. The last point which the law deals with is the right of an employee to make use of what he has seen, heard, or learned in his firm, his knowledge of the market, of manufacturing methods, business secrets, unprotected patents, receipts, price lists, names of customers, etc. The law tries to compromise between the interests of the employee and his firm.

During his stay with a firm the employee is bound to absolute secrecy; afterwards he may make use of his knowledge. Therefore it would be unfair trading for an employee to give price lists or a list of customers of his former firm to a competitor, who in inducing the former to do this would be guilty of the same offense. It would not be unfair trading to advise the new firm of the superiority of his former principal's methods in advertising or manufacturing or to suggest or to make an offer to a customer of the former firm. It is not lawful to give such advice while in service. It would therefore be unfair trading to copy lists of customers or descriptions of patents in order to in the future use such information.

The relief granted by the law is as follows: In all cases of unfair trading the plaintiff has an action for damages or for an injunction of the court.

Preliminary injunctions, whenever there is a necessity for them before a final decision can be attained.

In the following cases the offender is subject to criminal punishment: Conscious fake-representation; offense against the law governing sales, especially the buying of stock for sale. In case of bribery, giving and taking constitute a misdemeanor, the punishment for which may be a fine of 5,000 marks or a year imprisonment.

Are American firms entitled to take action against a German competitor for unfair trading?

Paragraph 28 of the law reads:

"That a foreign firm is protected when a German firm is protected under the foreign law."

Germany and the United States are both members of the so-called Paris Convention, modified by the Brussels acts of 1900, according to which any State member grants to the subjects of all other State members protection against unfair trading enjoyed by its own citizens. Therefore any relief granted under the law is shared by Americans as well as by German firms, so that American firms are fully protected against any unfair method of which German firms may be guilty.

JUDGMENTS.

1889. July 13. The following judgments were now read:

"Lord Esher, M. R.: In this case the evidence is voluminous and complicated. On carefully dissecting it, it seems to prove the following facts: At some time before an agreement, which will hereafter be referred to, was entered into between the defendants it appeared to the defendants that if more than a certain number of ships loaded tea at Hankow or Shanghai for England, the freights before charged could not be maintained. This is shown by 'suggestions to be considered as strictly confidential between the managers of the Peninsular & Oriental, the Glen, and the Ocean Steamship Cos.' It begins: 'So long as there is a glut of tonnage at Hankow, whether "conference" or not, it is impossible to maintain freights.' The defendants, therefore, resolved upon a plan, by which the number of vessels loading at those places should be limited. The plan was that a certain number of shipowners' firms—namely, the defendant firms—should enter into an agreement with each other that each of them should send an agreed number of ships to Hankow in the season, and that they should not admit more than a certain number of firms to be parties to the agreement, and that they should do certain things then agreed upon, and certain other things which should be afterwards agreed upon if thought necessary, in order to prevent any of those whom they did not admit to be parties to the agreement from being able to load tea at Hankow with any profit. Thus they would after a time drive any of such parties out of the carrying trade from Hankow or Shanghai to England, and then they, the confederated firms, could maintain the high freights which a free competition would inevitably lower. The means of prevention first agreed upon were an agreement that any shipping agent or shipping principal who agreed to ship, and who shipped only on Conference steamers throughout a season, should receive a rebate of 5 per cent on the agreed rate of freight of each shipment; but if any such agent, though directed by his principal to do so, or if any principal should ship any one cargo in a named period on board a nonconference steamer, he should not receive any rebate in respect of any cargo he had, either before the shipment on a nonconference ship or after it, during the period, shipped on board a conference ship. The means afterwards agreed upon and added were that if any nonconference steamer should proceed to Hankow to load independently, any necessary number of conference steamers should be sent at the same time to Hankow, in order to underbid the freight which the independent steamer might offer, without any regard to whether the freight they should thus bid would be remunerative or not. The plan was reduced into a written agreement signed by the defendants, dated originally April 7, 1884, and renewed or enlarged by verbal agreement, before May, 1885. This agreement stipulated that it was to bind each defendant until he should give a particular notice—namely, to all the principals at home. The agreement having been entered into by the defendants, they in May, 1885, refused to admit the plaintiffs to be parties to it. The plaintiffs thereupon resolved to send, and did send, two of their steamers, the Pathan and the Afghan, to Hankow, in order to obtain freights independently. The defendants issued circulars on May 11, 1885: 'That shipments by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other nonconference steamers at any of the ports in China, or at Hongkong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period in which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines.' Besides this, the defendants agreed to send, and did send, as many vessels as their agents thought necessary for the purpose to Hankow, for the express purpose of obtaining the carriage of all tea at any freight, however small, which might underbid and so oust the Pathan, the Afghan, or any other vessel of the plaintiffs from the carrying trade. The ultimate object of the defendants was no doubt to benefit themselves; but the immediate purpose was to drive out the plaintiffs. (See letters of May 1, 1885 (from the chairman of the Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co., defendants, threatening to close their relations with their agents at Hankow if they carried out their intention of loading home direct from Hankow for the plaintiffs); May 8, 1885 (from the representative of the Ocean Steamship Co., defendants, containing the following expression, 'to successfully oppose these outsiders it is necessary to have considerably more conference tonnage at Hankow'); and May 8, 1885 (from agents at Shanghai to one of the defendant firms containing the following expression, 'the best way to meet the case is to sanction a few more conference vessels going to Hankow, as with this supply of tonnage they would stand but little chance of getting full cargoes').) By the means agreed upon by the action directed by the defendants, the freight from Hankow to England was lowered from 50s. and upward to 25s., which was a wholly unremunerative freight, which could not be called an ordinary business freight, which was an artificial freight produced by the action of the defendants in order to carry out their immediate purpose of driving out the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs carried at the 25s. freight on that occasion, rather than sail their ships, which were already there, home empty. But it is obvious that if the contest were to be continued, the plaintiffs could not send their ships again to Hankow; they must be effectively driven out of the Hankow carrying trade, just as certainly and effectively as if their ships were physically stopped from going there. The plaintiffs being by the acts of the defendants driven from the trade, the defendants would resume their old rates of freight, rates fixed without competition. The plaintiffs on the season of 1885 would have earned a higher freight than 25s. In respect of subsequent years they were prevented from attempting to earn, according to circumstances and their own judgment, any freight from Hankow to England. The question is whether what the defendants did, and its consequences to the plaintiffs, gave the latter any legal cause of action.

"It seems to me well to consider, first, what view the law takes of the agreement of April 7, 1884, renewed or enlarged in 1885. In Hilton v. Eckersley (6 E. & B., 47) a bond was executed by certain masters, by which they agreed to be bound to each other in a penalty, nominally payable to one of them, if any one of them should carry on his works, in regard to amount of wages to be paid to persons employed therein, and as to the times or periods of the engagement of workpeople and the hours of work, otherwise than in conformity with the resolutions of the majority of the said masters. The defendant, one of the signing masters, carried on his works contrary to a resolution of the others, whereupon he was sued on the bond for the penalty. Crompton, J., said: 'I am of opinion that the bond is void, as being against public policy. I think that combinations like that disclosed in the pleadings in this case were illegal and indictable at common law, as tending directly to impede and interfere with the free course of trade and manufacture.' 'One of the most objectionable parts of this bond is that it takes away the freedom of action of the individual to carry on the trade, and to open and close his works according as it may be for his interest or that of the public.' He held that the bond was void as between the parties to it, because it was illegal as being in restraint of trade. Lord Campbell doubted whether the bond was illegal to the extent of rendering the parties to it indictable, but agreed that it was illegal as between the parties, and was, therefore, void. In the court of exchequer chamber, Alderson, B., gave the judgment. 'The question,' he said, 'is whether this is a bond in restraint of trade; and we think it is so. Prima facie, it is the privilege of a trader in a free country, in all matters not contrary to law, to regulate his own mode of carrying it on according to his own discretion and choice.' Speaking of the regulations, he said: 'All these are surely regulations restraining each man's power of carrying on his trade according to his discretion for his own best advantage, and therefore are restraints on trade, not capable of being legally enforced.' 'We do not mean to say that they are illegal, in the sense of being punishable and criminal. The case does not require us, and we think we ought not, to express any opinion on that point.' He then goes on to say that the fact of the combination of masters being formed to counteract a combination of workmen can not render the masters' combination legal. 'The maxim injuria non excusat injuriam, is a sound one, both in common sense and at common law.' Hornby v. Close (Law Rep. 2 Q. B., 153) is to the same effect. These cases decide that there is still, according to law, a restraint of trade which is contrary to law. They decide that an agreement whereby traders bind themselves not to carry on their trade according to their own judgment, but according to the judgment of others, is an agreement in restraint of trade. They decide that if such an agreement is made out, it is not made legal because it is entered into as a countermove against another similar agreement. Applying these propositions to the agreement of 1885, the defendants by it agree to carry on their trade of shipowners, not each according to his own judgment as circumstances may arise, but according to an agreed rule arrived at by the consent of others, not to be departed from without the consent of all. Unless the law holds this agreement to be void, the defendants have bound themselves to it by mutual agreement, which would be a sufficient consideration to bind each of them. They have bound themselves not to depart from the agreement without a particular kind of notice. The agreement, in accordance with the cited cases, must be held to be in restraint of trade, and therefore void as between the parties to it. The only reason why it can be held void is because it is illegal. A legal agreement voluntarily come to can not be held by law to be void. The cited cases leave open the question whether such an agreement amounts to an indictable conspiracy. They do not hold that it is not. But before considering that point it must be observed that the agreements held to be illegal because in restraint of trade must have been so held, not because there was any wrong done to the traders who agreed—for they all agreed to what was to be done—but because there was a wrong to the public. The restraining themselves from a free course of trade was held to be a wrong to the public. If that be so when parties agree to restrain themselves, it must be much more so when they agree to do acts which will restrain and are intended to restrain another trader from a free course of trade. That restraint is equally a wrong to the public. The present agreement is therefore illegal and void as in restraint of trade on that ground also.

"The cases cited do not determine whether an agreement which is void as between the partics to it because it is in restraint of trade is or is not an indictable offense. But if such an agreement is illegal because it is a wrong to the public, it seems to me impossible to say that it is not indictable. An illegal act which is a wrong against the public welfare seems to have the necessary elements of a crime. If, however, all agreements in restraint of trade are not necessarily indictable offenses, yet some may be. And if the agreement is one intended to interfere with the free course of trade of a trader who is not a party to the agreement, and can, if carried out, have that effect, then if such an interference is an illegal act as against the trader, it seems clear that the act of agreement is a wrongful act, both as against an individual and as against the public welfare, and then I am of opinion it must be an indictable conspiracy. 'There seems,' says Sir William Erle, in the most admirable essay styled "The Law Relating to Trade-Unions" (Macmillan & Co., 1869), a book more full of careful and accurate law than is to be found in many judgments, 'also to be authority for saying that a combination to violate a private right, in which the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime, such a violation being an actionable wrong' (Erle, p. 32). Unless the public has an interest in traders being left to their own judgment, and to a free course of trade, there is no foundation for the law as to agreements in restraint of trade being illegal. The public, therefore, has an interest which such agreement injures. It follows that if the agreement be an agreement to violate the right of an independent trader by restraining his trade, there is a sufficient public interest which is also injured, and the agreement is an indictable conspiracy. It becomes necessary now to consider what interference with an independent trader will be a violation of his private right. Now, a long line of cases has determined that every trader in the Queen's dominions has by law a legal right to carry on his trade in ordinary course of trade according to his own will and judgment, and the law has decided that for some kinds of interference with that right the trader interfered with has a right of action. Alderson, B., in the exchequer chamber, in Hilton v. Eckersley (6 E. & B., 47, at p. 74), says: 'Prima facie, it is the privilege of a trader in a free country, in all matters not contrary to law, to regulate his own mode of carrying it on according to his own discretion and choice.' Turning again to the careful analysis of law in Sir William Erle's book, I agree with him (p. 13) that 'these propositions assume that a person has a right to do as he chooses with his own, whether labor or capital, within the limits set by law; that a right involves a prohibition against the infringement thereof; and that a prohibition involves a remedy for the violation thereof.' The particular right of a trader—which we are considering—is his right to carry on his trade according to a free course of trade. The plaintiffs had that right on their side; but so also had the defendants on their side. The next question is, What will amount, as between rival traders, to an encroachment by the one on this right of the other? Each has a right to carry on his trade in a free course of trade, according to his own free will and judgment. So long as the one so carries on his trade, the other can not, without infringing on the right of his rival, effectively complain. So long as each so carries on his trade, though such carrying on produces the utmost extent of competition, and consequent lowering of gain, neither can validly complain. Each is exercising the free course of trade. But if one goes beyond the exercise of the course of trade, and does an act beyond what is the course of trade, in order—that is to say, with intent—to molest the other's free course of trade, and which does molest the other's free course of trade, he is not exercising his own freedom of a course of trade; he is not acting in, but beyond, the course of trade; and then it follows that his act is an unlawful obstruction of the other's right to a free course of trade; and if such obstruction causes damage to the other, he is entitled to maintain an action for the wrong. 'At common law,' says Sir W. Erle (p. 6), 'every person has individually, and the public also have collectively, a right to require that the course of trade should be kept free from unreasonable obstruction.' 'Every person has a right under the law, as between him and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description—done, not in the exercise of the actor's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction—would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition; and the violation of this prohibition by a single person is a wrong, to be remedied either by action or indictment, as the case may be. It is equally a wrong whether it be done by one or by many—subject to this observation, that a combination of many to do a wrong, in a matter where the public has an interest, is a substantive offense of conspiracy' (p. 12). The limitation of the competing rights, then, is that the act which has in fact obstructed the full right of the one must, in order to be actionable, be an act done by the other beyond the exercise of the actor's own right, and for the purpose of obstruction. In Lumley v. Gye (2 E. & B., 216) and in Bowen v. Hall (6 Q. B. D., 333) the act done which obstructed the plaintiff's right was the persuading a person employed by the plaintiff, under contract, to break that contract. Such persuasion is not in ordinary course of trade. The ordinary competition of trade is a fair competition, not a secret persuasion of others to do wrong. The next question in those cases was whether what was done was intended to obstruct the plaintiff. With regard to that point, it is laid down in Bowen v. Hall (6 Q. B. D., 333, at p. 338): 'The act of the defendants which is complained of must be an act wrongful in law and in fact. Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact. * * * But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act if injury ensues from it.' The law there is laid down that a malicious motive in the defendant may make an act which would not be wrongful without the malice a wrongful act when done with malice. It was thought that the judgment in Lumley v. Gye (2 E. & B., 216) was founded on the view that there was malice in the defendant, and that view was adopted and approved in Bowen v. Hall (6 Q. B. D., 333). The word 'malice' is satisfied by the thing being done with the knowledge of the plaintiff's right and with intent to interfere with it 'maliciously,' or, which is the same thing, 'with notice,' per Crompton, J., in Lumley v. Gye (2 E. & B., 216, at p. 224). This effect of malice is adopted by Sir W. Erle, and so long ago as by Lord Holt in Keeble v. Hickeringill (11 East, note, p. 574). 'Suppose,' he says, 'the defendant had shot in his own ground; if he had occasion to shoot, it would have been one thing; but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing, and a wrong.' In truth I have never known this rule doubted.

"The propositions applicable to the present case which are to be deduced from the above considerations are the following: First, that the head of law, which we are considering, applies only to trade and to traders; second, that the law has a peculiar care for the preservation of a free course of trade as between traders, because such freedom is for the benefit of the public; third, that the principal formula of law for the purpose of enforcing this peculiar care is that every trader has a legal right to a free course of trade, meaning thereby a legal right to be left free to exercise his trade according to his own will and judgment; fourth, that if anyone, by an act wrongful as against that right, interferes with it to the injury of a trader, an action lies against such person by such trader; fifth, that any act of fair trade competition, though it injure a rival trader even to the destruction of his trade, is not a wrongful act as against such rival trader's right, but is only the exercise of the first-mentioned trader's equal right, and is therefore not actionable; sixth, any act, though of the nature of competition in trade, but which is an act beyond the limits of fair trade competition, and which is therefore not an act of any real course of trade at all, and the immediate and necessary effect of which is such an interference with a rival trader's right to a free course of trade as prevents him from exercising his full right to a free course of trade, leads to an almost irresistible inference of an indirect motive, and is therefore—unless, as may be possible, the motive is negatived—a wrongful act as against his right, and is actionable if injury ensue; seventh, an act of competition, otherwise unobjectionable, done not for the purpose of competition, but with intent to injure a rival trader in his trade, is not an act done in an ordinary course of trade, and therefore is actionable if injury ensue; eighth, an agreement among two or more traders, who are not and do not intend to be partners, but where each is to carry on his trade according to his own will, except as regards the agreed act, that agreed act being one to be done for the purpose of interfering, i. e., with intent to interfere with the trade of another, is a thing done not in the due course of trade, and is therefore an act wrongful against that other trader, and is also wrongful against the right of the public to have free competition among traders, and is therefore a wrongful act against such trader, and, if it is carried out and injury ensue, is actionable; ninth, such an agreement, being a public wrong, is also of itself an illegal conspiracy, and is indictable.

"It follows that in the present case the agreement of 1885 was within the rules 8 and 9 an indictable conspiracy, and that when it was carried out to its immediate and intended effect, which was an injury to the plaintiffs' right to a free course of trade, the plaintiffs had a good cause of action against the defendants.

"It follows that the act of the defendants in lowering their freights far beyond a lowering for any purpose of trade—that is to say, so low that if they continued it they themselves could not carry on trade—was not an act done in the exercise of their own free right of trade, but was an act done evidently for the purpose of interfering with, i. e., with intent to interfere with, the plaintiffs' right to a free course of trade, and was therefore a wrongful act as against the plaintiffs' right; and as injury ensued to the plaintiffs, they had also in respect of such act a right of action against the defendants. The plaintiffs, in respect of that act, would have had a right of action if it had been done by one defendant only; they have it still more clearly when that act was done by several defendants combined for that purpose. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. The damages, if that be the correct conclusion as to the right of action, are to be ascertained. They are, in my opinion, the difference between the freight of 25s., which the plaintiffs were forced to accept, and the freight they would have obtained without other interference than a legal fair competition in 1885, and damages at large for being prevented from endeavoring to earn freight from Hankow to England in subsequent years, after taking into account the probability of using their ships in some other trade. I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed."

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. STONE. I desire to report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution and to ask that it may be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Appropriations. The accompanying papers are as follows:

A letter dated April 8, 1914, from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of Representatives; a letter dated March 30, 1914, from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of the Treasury, both of which are in print, and also a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, if it is necessary that Members of the Senate should know what the Senator from Missouri is saying, we should like to be able to hear him.

Mr. STONE. I beg pardon. I was asking to report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a resolution with the request that the resolution, with the accompanying papers, which I have indicated, may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to any business at this time except the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will permit me, this is an international matter. It relates to an invitation to the Government of the United States to attend an international convention to be held at Montevideo, and if it is to be complied with it must be done at once or it will be too late. It is a mere matter of international courtesy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator says he desires to have the resolution referred to the Appropriations Committee, I will withdraw the objection to its being reported at this time.

Mr. STONE. That is my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a resolution which he asks may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the resolution by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 166) authorizing the President to designate two officers connected with the Public Health Service to represent the United States at the Sixth International Sanitary Conference of American States to be held at Montevideo, Uruguay, in December, 1914, and making an appropriation to pay the expenses of said representatives, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOCIAL INSURANCE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask permission to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation and to appoint delegates to participate in the International Conference on Social Insurance. I hope no objection will be made, because the convention is to be held in September of this year, and if this Government is to accept the invitation it will have to do so speedily. It is necessary that the Foreign Relations Committee should act upon it. The time is very short, and I hope no objection will be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I will have to object to the introduction of the joint resolution at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as was confessed by the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] for himself, I, too, confess for myself that I am somewhat responsible, in common with the industrious members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, for the legislation which is now under assault. As to section 5, I am particularly responsible, in view of the fact that in the preparation of portions of that section I feel I imposed my legal opinion upon a subcommittee and had it accepted possibly for more than its value. I wish, therefore, to refer to a few objections which have been urged from the floor with great industry and ability by certan Senators in opposition to this legislation. I rise to reply to the able Senator from Utah, and the equally capable Senator from Missouri, both of whom have just concluded their presentation against the bill.

At the outset, Mr. President, let me frankly say that I am not unconscious of where the weakness really lies in form of legislation. There is a lack of public opinion behind these measures. There is a want of knowledge, upon the part of the country at large, as to what these measures purport, what are the objects of them, and what they are intended to accomplish. There is a greater misapprehension as to what they are not intended to accomplish.

The able Senator from Rhode Island, whether consciously or not, really voiced the want of confidence that there is in the country at large among those who are called business men as to any legislation attempted in this body. There is an opinion prevailing in rather eminent quarters that there are but two motives which animate and inspire this assemblage to legislation: One is on the part of certain Senators who seek to cultivate the favor of the thoughtless and impulsive in order to obtain a political following and popular support; another is on the part of those who possess the muniments of wealth and can not possibly conceive how any man can have an honest objection either to what they do or to the methods they undertake. These ever assert that our only purposes are to execute resentment against all prosperity; to level an assault against all affluence, and to introduce and advance legislation for the purpose only of perpetrating some revenge upon those who have succeeded and gratifying some vengeance upon those who possess. So long as this country or any respectable portion of it shall be invested with this false belief and be possessed of this dangerous illusion there will be no support of thoughtful public opinion behind the attempt to enact remedial legislation such as we are now undertaking. Public papers in this Nation of great eminence, of great influence, through their editorial expressions have very frankly conveyed the idea that this whole form of antitrust legislation, or this legislation having for its purpose the regulation of the whole trust commercial system, has only the effect of retarding business progress; that its ultimate effect is to confuse business enterprise; that in itself it discourages initiative, and is an evidence on the part of the Senate of its want of appreciation of the rights of the business interests on the one hand, or its lack of a sense of public duty and what it owes these great business interests on the other.

The public at large, therefore, have become educated to the belief that we have no real purpose to remedy the ills of man in this legislation; that our object is to perpetrate an ill upon a selected class of men; that our real purpose is not to frame a legal measure that may be executed with ease and consummated within the law, but that it is to propose a measure, without regard to its constitutional fundamentals, which shall attract to us a form of political following for election purposes, and that we are quite content that the law shall be illegal in many features and that its ultimate fate before the court shall be what it may, providing we can merely achieve the passage of some measure to claim immediate credit for the achievement.

I am aware, Mr. President, that such views held as to certain other legislative bodies in this country might not be very effective or harmful; but in all my reading or public observation I can conceive of no legislative body so wounded in its strength, so powerless in its ultimate results, by such public opinion honestly indulged by this high class of our citizens as this, the Senate of the United States.

It was in the dream of the fathers who founded this body that it might serve ever as a temple of confidence, and by its very presence inspire mankind with the feeling that however the storms of vengeance might rage without, and however popular clamor might succeed in another branch, that here, in the safe, solid, reflective body of the Senate would be a recourse and a refuge against all of these things that stormed against the rights of man in haste or in fury. This being the ideal, there was a feeling of respect for the Senate as an institution for the preservation of property and for the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the citizen.

I deplore to confess that this confidence by the country at large has been seriously diminished, if not completely destroyed. The Senate has ceased to be that heretofore understood deliberative and conservative body, exercising restraints within the Constitution and preserving the rights of man within the charter of human liberties. The Senate has gotten to be regarded as the extreme radical wing of the Federal Government, with the particular object charged to it of having one body of this legislature vie with the other as to the most radical methods which can be proposed in legislation and the most daring and audacious legislation in itself that can be conceived by the mind as having the most popular claim or that might be followed by the greatest applause of the crowds.

Mr. President, this picture is not true to its original; but we can not deny that it is true as to the popular feeling among the thoughtful and reflective citizens of our time.

One of the things which has produced this has been the tendency of the courts, voluntarily, or at least without serious justification, to find a chance to hold legislation invalid, either upon the ground that it violates the Constitution or upon the ground that it is an inexpedient form of legislation; also, where the courts will not hold a law unconstitutional, the same act is oftentime decimated and emasculated by rulings which rob the law of its practical effects to the people. The public conclude that one of two things must exist: That if they are to continue in respect for the courts, with their decisions against the laws of the legislative body, they must lose their respect for the learning and wisdom of the legislative body. If they must continue to respect the legislative body as wise and patriotic, they must withdraw their confidence from the courts as being either learned or patriotic.

This condition has been brought about by a general tendency on the part of certain large institutions—I use the word "large" in the sense of power—which have found a safe refuge in the general charge of "unconstitutionality" against all forms of legislation which seek to remedy public wrongs or to punish public offenses. These institutions have found a ready audience in certain courts throughout this country, and they have readily found great support from certain of the eminent press of America. Thus a popular atmosphere can be created that nothing the United States Senate can do is respectable in its undertaking and nothing it has accomplished is legal in its determination.

Mr. President, I regret to admit that there is much foundation for this general suspicion and general accusation. Heretofore this body has too hastily passed legislation at the dictates of what appeared to be popular clamor, or to serve what might appear at the time to be the uses of political organization. After the temper of the time has cooled down, the fury has been assuaged, and the popular will, like a receding tide, has calmed itself into peaceful waters, and there could be a view cast over the whole surface as to the rightfulness of the thing, many of the acts, much of the legislation, passed by this body must be condemned as lacking judgment in the consideration of the interests of mankind, as wanting practicality in the methods of its execution, and, finally, as being utterly without regard to the general rights of the general citizens of the United States of America, which this body was primarily constituted to consider and conserve.

While that is true, however—and I concede it reluctantly, and can name instances to justify my impeachment—I do deny that, because there have been these several instances, that every instance attempted here in this body looking to remedying of wrongs against the great mass of citizenship is to be impeached, either by the accusation of unconstitutionality within the fundamental law or want of judgment, measured by the standard of business sense; and I assert that if there had not been in the past such success attending the efforts of certain favorite institutions and favorite interests of this country in their assaults on every law that was passed to remedy the wrongs of the public, we would not have these interjections of "unconstitutionality" so frequently introduced to every measure attempted or proposed in a legislative body.

Now, sir, let us contemplate for a moment the spirit behind these assaults. To the Senators who make them, every honesty of motive must at once be ascribed, integrity of mind must be conceded, patriotism of purpose must be admitted; but at the outset it is claimed that the law is unconstitutional for stated reasons. I use the words of the able Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], to whom I grant, as did the Senator from Iowa, great certificate of merit as to his legal ability, and the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], whose capacity as a lawyer can be attested by anyone who has ever been thrown within the zone of his accomplishments. These distinguished gentlemen, representing the objections urged from each side of the Chamber, are impressed with the idea that this form of legislation violates the fundamentals of the Constitution in this:

First. That it is an attempt to transfer purely judicial powers from the courts to administrative bodies which have not been created under the Constitution as courts.

Second. That it is an attempt to vest in a general body of citizens somewhere the exercise of discretion in control over the affairs of mankind without that discretion being specifically defined as to how they shall act, where they shall act, by what rule they shall act, and what shall be the exact limitation beyond which they shall not act.

Naturally there arises to the Anglo-Saxon mind——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely.

Mr. REED. If the Senator is endeavoring to state my position, he is unfortunate in his expression. All that I have ever said with reference to this bill is that the legislative body must at least lay down the general rule. That is very different from saying, as I understand the Senator to say, that I have insisted that the legislature must specify every act and lay down a limitation as to everything. What I have contended—I know the Senator means to state my position fairly, and I merely referred to that in my remarks—is that there must be a general rule laid down; and I think the Senator will hardly dispute that proposition.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be, Mr. President, that I have misapprehended, to a degree greater in detail than was intended by the able Senator, his position; but that I have stated generally the viewpoint of the Senate as to that which was gathered from the able Senator, I think will be admitted.

I wish, therefore, to allude to both positions as stated by the able Senator himself, and as we heard elaborated by the very full and copious presentation of the Senator from Utah.

This bill, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] stated, has for its purpose a regulation of commerce. Mr. President, it is an interesting thing to recall that every attempt at the regulation of any commerce by any law of this body has been invariably met by the objection of the want of constitutionality. I concede, as heretofore I have observed in my reply some days ago to the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that if this Government were now situated as it was in the days of the fathers, with the distances between the States; when the citizen in the State found all his necessities gratified by what a State could produce or what its laws could afford, I should be found opposing the Federal Government entering into the domain of the control of the private citizen's affairs under the guise of national supervision. I have been forced to the conclusion, however, that the day has passed in this my Government when there ever will be again a distinctive line of political geography to be drawn upon legislation as a test of its constitutionality or validity. There never again will exist in this country as the standard of power the mere geographical line of where one State ends and another State begins. Instead of its being a geographical division that shall be the test as to whether legislation is within or without the power of any legislative body, it will be the subject matter of the legislation, rather than the domain and zone in which it is to operate.

Thus we are confronted; and we recall the history that when the interstate-commerce act originally was in this body, as far back as 1887 and 1888, it was assailed upon the ground that it was unconstitutional; and so ferocious were the assaults that when the time came to vote on that measure—as is reported by my distinguished predecessor in his memoirs; Heaven grant peace to his final rest—so great was the assault, said Senator Cullom, one of the authors of the bill, that when the vote came in the Senate Senators deserted the Chamber, leaving a quorum of but two, by which the interstate-commerce act was passed. So able a lawyer as Senator George, of Mississippi, than whom there was no abler, measured by the standard of constitutional learning, refused to remain in the Chamber. He did not find it agreeable to assail the law. He could not, however, from his viewpoint of constitutionality, give it his approval.

The assault that it was unconstitutional for the reasons laid down by the able Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] as to section 5, and the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] as to the general purpose of this similar bill, was led by Senator Evarts, of New York, accredited to be a distinguished lawyer and head of the American bar, former Secretary of State. So confirmed was Senator Evarts that it was not in the power of the Government to vest this form of inquisition—to use the words of the able Senator from Utah—within an administrative body, that he denounced the act as being a reflection upon the intelligence of this body. Not only would he not support it, but at home, before the bar association of the State of New York, he gave the passage of the act as an evidence of a decadence of wisdom on the part of the Senate.

We saw the Supreme Court of the United States, however, overrule the able Senator from New York, the head of the American bar. We saw that court pause and consider what the American people needed rather than what the distinguishing minds of lawyers demanded. We saw that court listen to the needs of the country in order to give relief to its people, rather than that which merely prescribed distinctive lines of demarkation in construction that would give justification to refined distinctions.

So, finally, these gentlemen who had cried out "unconstitutional" as to the main act, and been confounded, said, when the court had declared the law valid: "Well, there is one clause that never can be sustained—the long and short haul clause."

I call the attention of my able friends—and I refer to both Senators from Utah, who live in a zone that has had to fight for its very life against the unjust exactions of railroads upon that western country—I call the attention of those able Senators to the fact that there was a constant assault on the long and short haul clause of the interstate-commerce act upon two grounds: First, that it vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission judicial power to determine what was a long and what was a short haul, and how much should be equitably charged for the short haul as compared to the long; second, that it placed within them an unlimited form of discretion by which they were to determine within themselves what was equivalent to a long and a short haul and to say, without control upon their discretion, where they would draw the limit of one charge and where they would assert the other.

Able minds of the Senate felt that that whole clause would have to be held invalid. There were those who so insisted upon it that there was little doubt in their minds, and they kept away from the courts, fearing the consequences. Finally, from the State that once I had the honor to represent in Congress, the State of Washington, in litigation in which I was incidentally connected in the lower court, and where my views were denied in the lower court, the question was squarely brought to test. The Supreme Court of the United States, after 12 years of litigation through the intermediate tribunals, finally decided that case. That court held the only remaining clause of the commerce act as to which there was held a charge of unconstitutionality to be valid and constitutional and overruled the objections urged against it, which were of the very nature, though probably not so potently put, as now urged by the distinguished Senators who have made their charge of unconstitutionality and inoperativeness against the bill now before the Senate—like in form to that one previously assailed upon similar grounds.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My recollection is not quite as clear as it ought to be upon the subject, but, as I recollect, the original long and short haul clause was practically inoperative, and it was not until we amended the law two or three or four years ago that a long and short haul clause was written into the law which stood the test. That long and short haul clause was debated here in the Senate, and I remind the Senator from Illinois that I defended upon the floor of the Senate the constitutionality of that particular long and short haul clause, and the Supreme Court recently held the long and short haul clause in the present law to be constitutional. That was not the case, however, as I recall, with reference to the original long and short haul clause.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will, of course, accept the declaration of the able Senator from Utah as to a matter in which he personally participated. I did not have the honor of being in this body at that time. This much, however, I am able to assure him from the history recorded, that the particular assaults upon the last amendment, which he supported in legislation, were of the very nature as the assault against the older, and the older and the new contained practically the same clauses, so far as the forms of legal assault permitted. It may be true that there was another feature—and I accept the Senator's statement as to that without qualification—which it was regarded as inoperative, in that it would produce impractical conclusions. As to that I have no knowledge.

But now, say the Senators, as their next point upon which they insist to support their claim of general unconstitutionality is a delegation of power. It is charged that there is a delegation on the part of a legislative body to this commission of either legislative or judicial powers.

Mr. President, who says the delegation of any power by the Congress to any other body is wrong? What an inclination there is in the human mind merely to engage in a thought, and to assume that because that has been an expression of the past its philosophy must be right. There is no fundamental law against delegating authority. All government is based on the theory of the delegation of some authority to some sources, otherwise authority never could be executed by any agency. What the Senators mean to say is that power specifically delegated to one body can not be delegated by that body to another body, because the theory of delegata potestas non potest delegari is born of this idea, that where the people vest a certain confidence in a certain source and place in it the authority to execute certain duties, they will not allow that particular body to transfer to some other body which has not been chosen and which has not been selected for the exercise the discharge of those particular discretions. The charge generally, however, that when a legislative body delegates some duties to another body this can be urged as a reason for holding those duties unauthorized is error.

It will be remembered that we have had this test. I heard the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], if I recall, go far back to sustain the proposition of illegality because delegated. I recall his reading the case In re Locke, from Seventy-fifth Pennsylvania. That was a case in which the prohibition laws were at stake, and the question was how far you could delegate to certain individuals the right to say when a law should go into effect. But we in the West have that question ever with us, and the Supreme Court of California, in the case of Ex parte Wall (44 Cal.), if I am not deficient in recollection, laid down the law that that delegation could not be; that it would not be in the power of the legislature to transmit to some other body—to wit, the electorate—the right to say how a law should be executed or when. In after considerations, however, our courts began to see that after the frame of our Government that doctrine could not be longer maintained; that the only way we could execute an administrative government was to declare a policy general in its application and then to commit to some source which had our trust the discretion as to how that policy was to be applied and when. Consequently both of the rulings alluded to by the able Senator have not been the law for 20 years in this country. In every State, city, and village we now leave to a popular vote the ratification or rejection of a law passed by the legislative bodies or submit to the electorate to say upon what event or time the law should go into effect.

Senators in this body call attention to the doctrine of delegation. The able Senator from Utah refers to this question of the delegation of legislative power to an administrative body, but I invite his learned consideration to the fact that while originally there were views of that kind, and in Field v. Clark (143 U. S.) there was a very serious consideration of the thought, where the court practically intimated that a mere delegation of power which had been given to one could not be transmitted by that one to another, it did not deny the right of President McKinley or the President then in power to exercise the delegated authority under the McKinley reciprocity clause so far as executing the power under the conditions made necessary as conditions precedent. Subsequently, as the able Senator will recall, the question came squarely before the Supreme Court of the United States as to the power of this body to transmit or delegate some partly legislative and partly judicial function to an administrative body. It came, in the case of Goodrich Transit Co., to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the interstate commerce law was assailed, as the able Senators recall, upon the ground that it authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe the manner of keeping accounts, to sit in judgment as to when they were properly kept, when they were properly maintained, and when their violation existed, and the form of punishment to be visited on the infractions.

It was contended that that was a delegation and came within the ancient theories which had been interdicted and prohibited by our theory of government. But the Supreme Court of the United States, in Two hundred United States, leave us no longer in doubt and lay down the doctrine which I assume the able Senators will admit I state accurately, that wherever the delegation is a mere delegation of the exercise of a direction as to when and upon what thing the law shall apply when within terms of a law already passed by the legislative body, that is not a delegation of legislative power nor a delegation of judicial right. It is a mere authorization to an arm of government to say when and where and under what facts the particular law passed by the legislative body shall be called into operation.

That is the exact situation here. No mind, however individuated or discriminating, can find a difference. Therefore however might have been the wise reasonings of able Senators which had been most influential for 20 years past, I must say that we have outlived them. I regret it because I am a defender of what I feel to be the fundamental divisions of government. If I had my mere ipse dixit, I would assert it never should be departed from and no limitations would ever be leaped beyond.

However, Mr. President, if all divisional lines are wiped out, all demarcations of power lost sight of, we will have the mere commingling of all forms of power. Then finally those who have the greatest power will exercise it in any manner they can against those who have the least.

But unfortunately my Government seems to no longer pay heed to these things. We have reached this point that I lay down now what I believe to be the axiom of the times. The popular mind of our Nation is more centered upon laws which fit the institutions of our people than that which fits the constitution of the lawyers. They have reached sadly the idea that many clauses of the Constitution have become obsolete and are unfitted to the demands of modern days. They insist that to the extent that in the instances of obsolete paragraphs it is an injustice to array such sections as an obstruction against the advance of that which is necessary as remedy and relief to a people who demand reform and rescue, aye, refuge from threatened destruction and impending dangers. In the era which is swirling about us the mere cry of unconstitutionality offered to regulation and barrier against public wrongs will not avail. This refuge resort to privilege has been broken down and shattered into such heaps as can not be molded into shape for the protection of the public offender against private justice. Therefore I most respectfully urge that there is nothing in the assertion as to the delegation because of the adjudications I have cited.

Now, I come to the third suggestion and I dispose of it with a mere statement. The able Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] raised, to my mind, a most interesting point. It was likewise made by my friend the able Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] in committee work upon this bill. That was whether the clause under the bill which permits examinations of books and calls for the inspection of documents and brings forth the individual to make known and clarify certain personal matters of his own is not a violation of what the able Senator from Utah calls the right of private protection, whether it did not violate the constitutional spirit against unreasonable search and seizure, and whether, finally, it did not force him to reveal and betray private affairs of life, which it was the object of our Government, among other things, to protect him inviolate in.

I say if this bill as it is framed worked that result, by calling forth any individual and forcing the individual to divulge his private affairs merely for the obedience to a prosecution on the part of the Government or to serve the competition of rivals, I would be among those who would first denounce it as violative not only of the letter of the Constitution but of what I regard to be one of the most fundamental spirits that sanctify this Government in all the sacrifices of the past which has made all the splendor of the present. But I must discriminate and individuate between the section now before us for consideration and the fundamental doctrine which is urged by the Senator.

What is the position? I contend that interstate commerce is specifically reserved to the Federal Government in the Constitution, by it to be regulated, and I do urge that when the word "regulated" was written in the Constitution it carried with it all the word "regulated" could be conceived in meaning. It meant to assert that anyone engaged in interstate commerce in any form was the subject of constitutional regulation when he touched interstate commerce. Regulation has ever been construed to mean all those things which are essential to keep regular the conduct of one man, upon the theory that he should not use his property in a manner that would injure or destroy that of another.

If this were a provision that had for its mere object the calling forth of any citizen to betray his private affairs, to disclose his personal dealings concerning his personal affairs at the instance of curiosity seekers, or of obtaining evidence for the purpose of prosecuting the citizen, I would join heartily with the distinguished Senators in every form of denunciation which human imagination could conjure or anathema might phrase.

But I pause to ask, What is this? As the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has brought forth, the Supreme Court of the United States has, in 159 and 145, specifically taken for consideration the clause requiring the producing of books before the Interstate Commerce Commission and has held it legal, valid, and appropriate.

I take it the learned Senator from Utah does not contend but what that may be true, but he draws an artful and apt distinction fortified with copious learning and conceived facts to sustain the line of distinction advanced. That is that the section compels the individual to produce his books or to produce the corporation's books, and from these books to have the information gathered from it, and likewise his private papers.

For what purpose? I answer only when there has been some complaint that the law has been violated and the protection of commerce taken from some citizen and conferred as a favor to another. Then upon complaint of such, and only then, will there arise the privilege of the examination. Then it arises only after complaint, and upon this form of complaint comes the examination.

We pause, then, to consider the two cases the able Senator read. The case of United States against Boyd, One hundred and sixteenth United States, was where a man was forced at the instance of the Government to bring his books and to disclose the record respecting distillations disclosing his own violations of the criminal law. Surely that is entirely wrong, and no one could justify it.

The Weeks case, in Two hundred and thirty-second United States, was where the officers of the law seized the defendant without authority or without warrant of the court, then proceeded to invade his home and business place, and seized his papers, and with them seized the man and produced the papers in evidence against the man. Surely that was as complete a violation of the fundamental rights of a man within the Constitution as we can imagine. Why? Because it was an unreasonable search and seizure. It was with no form of previous complaint, and under no warrant of arrest or search based on a complaint properly framed, setting forth the description of the alleged things desired.

I invite my learned brother lawyers' attention to a governmental fact: There is no law in this Government against search and seizure. There could not be without destruction of our form of government, for there must come a time when search and seizure of certain kinds of persons and places are essential and saving to every form of freedom. The law is against "unreasonable search and seizure." The test therefore should turn on whether the Government is unreasonable in its search or its seizure.

The test of that then must depend on whether there is reason within the law for that search and seizure, where that reason is sufficient under any law looking to the prohibition of the violation of public rights by a corporation or by an individual seeking to violate public rights by standing upon what he calls his constitutional privilege to do so. So the learned Senator must see that it would never do for the Government to say, "We shall allow interstate commerce between the States to any citizen within any State and allow him to serve as an agent in behalf of the people"—say, for instance, a railroad company, and to it to say, "You are a mere agent of the public; your highway is the people's; we, the people, authorize you to use it and take compensation for your work for serving the public, and yet we allow you as the agent of the public to come in and deny to the people the very information that belongs to them. You are serving as their agent and representative, yet you are to be exempted from disclosing to them their papers upon the claim that they are your private papers; that their books in your control are your private books; that their knowledge held by you for their service and public welfare is your private information." That is intolerable in its conception. It is denied by every form of legal judgment. It is without every form of guarantee within the law, and I am not able to give it the countenance even of the claim of common sense.

I recall that the learned Senator relies much upon Hale against Henkel, Two hundred and one United States. I call his attention to this point, that wherever there is complaint that there has been a violation of public law and there is an attempt to procure books in order to get such facts as serve the public welfare, the individual can not, either in behalf of the corporation or himself, contend against it, nor would enforced production of the books or papers under such necessity be an unreasonable search or an unreasonable seizure.

I ask the Senator's attention to a case criticizing, or rather distinguishing, the case he read—the case of Wheeler against the United States—which, I think, meets the exact point of the able Senator, word for word, at least the spirit of it, and with such aptness that there can be no discrimination afforded that shall possibly construe it out of its application. The defendant's witnesses were called forth to bring the books to a grand jury. Mark you, this is a criminal case. They were called to bring them before the grand jury in order to ascertain what this corporation had been doing respecting certain matters, and a subpœna duces tecum was issued. The corporation had transferred its books to certain persons. The point is made, first, that they are private books, private information; second, that the corporation no longer possessed them, that they were in the hands of a private individual; and the private individual makes the point that they were corporate books, and he can not be forced to deliver them. The particular point, that they are private papers, is raised, as by the able Senator. I read the point raised by counsel for the defense:

If the books and papers described in the subpœna were the private property of appellants, the court's order requiring their production before the grand jury, and the judgments of contempt based upon the disobedience of that order, violated their rights under the fifth amendment not to be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against oneself, and under the fourth amendment to be exempt from unreasonable searches and seizures.

I think that states the exact position of the able Senator as made by him here. Now, says the court:

The position that the orders of the court of commitment and imprisonment deprived defendants of their liberty without due process of law seems to be based upon the contention that the corporation was in no way obliged to obey the subpœna, and that, after its dissolution, it was not subject to any subpœna requiring the production of books and papers before the grand jury. But we do not think there is any merit in this objection. If the Government had the legal right to demand the production of the books and papers in question, with a view to the investigation of the alleged offense of Wheeler and Shaw in the proceedings before the grand jury, whether the subpœna was drawn in proper form or not or whether the corporation, in view of its dissolution, could have been compelled to comply with its requirements, in the attitude which the case has taken, is immaterial. It is apparent from the facts already recited that Wheeler and Shaw were required by the subpœna duces tecum to bring before the grand jury the books and papers of the corporation which had been dissolved and that they so understood the subpœna; that they were in possession of such books and papers which could be by them produced before the grand jury, and that before the order of commitment was made the defendants were allowed a full hearing in a court of competent jurisdiction. No objection was taken to the technical form of the subpœna in directing it to the corporation and not the individuals. There is nothing to show it was so broad as to be objectionable, as was indicated of the subpœna in Hale v. Henkel (201 U. S., 43). The defendants, in possession of the books and papers, were denying the right of the court to compel their production because of the dissolution of the corporation, because the title and possession of the books and papers had passed to the defendants individually and were their private property as tenants in common, and they had no possession or custody of the documents as officers of the corporation, and because, as against them, the compulsory production of such books and correspondence would violate their rights under the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

We think the questions of substance now presented are whether the rights of the defendants as individuals to be exempt from unreasonable search and seizure of their property and from being compelled to be witnesses against themselves would be violated by the compulsory production of the documents in question.

We are of opinion that this case is virtually ruled by Wilson against United States, supra. In that case it was held that there was no unreasonable search or seizure where the officer of a corporation, whose guilt of an offense against the laws of the United States was under investigation, was compelled to produce books and papers of the corporation of which he was president, because, as against the corporation, the true owner of the books and papers, their production might lawfully be compelled, and that there was no self-incrimination of such officer, because he was not compelled to produce his private books, but the books of the corporation, which were not within the protection given to the private books and papers of an individual. We are unable to see that this case differs in principle from that one. It is true the corporation in the present case had ceased to exist, but its books and papers were still in existence and were still impressed with the incidents attending corporate documents. Wheeler and Shaw had been officers of the corporation, and the books of the company had before the dissolution been made over to them; but this did not change the essential character of the books and papers or make them any more privileged in the investigation of crime than they were before.

Wheeler and Shaw, it may be admitted, could no longer be officers of the corporation, although the record shows that they had never resigned their positions. The corporation, however, had gone out of existence, leaving its books and papers in the possession of the defendants, and, it may be conceded, for many purposes such books belonged to them; but, as was held in the Wilson case, the privilege of the Constitution against unreasonable searches and seizures does not protect against the lawful examination, in due course, of books of this character, nor does the privilege of individuals against self-incrimination in the production of their own books and papers prevent the compulsory production of the books of a corporation with which they happen to be or have been associated. It was the character of the books and papers as corporate records and documents which justified the court in ordering their production, as this court ruled in the Wilson case—

And so forth. We can see no difference in this case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Accepting the statement of the Senator from Illinois, for the sake of argument, as being correct, then, as I understand him and as I understand the authorities to which he refers, the subpœna to produce the books and papers must be in connection with an investigation of some kind for a specific violation of law. Am I correct?

Mr. LEWIS. An investigation of some kind for a specific violation or under some specific complaint. It may not be a violation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; a specific violation of law of some character.

Mr. LEWIS. Or a specific complaint of some kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The case to which the Senator has just alluded was a proceeding before a grand jury. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that under section 3 of this trade commission bill the power which is conferred upon the trade commission to require the production of books and papers of a corporation is a substantive power; that is, it is not a power incidental to some other power. The provision of the section is:

The commission shall have power, among others—

Then (a) states a specific substantive power.

Then (b) states a specific substantive power:

To require any corporation subject to the provisions of this act which the commission may designate to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements, and records concerning its organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices—affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership, and to make copies of the same.

And so on—

Then follows another distinct power after that. The Senator will observe that the power is not given to this trade commission in connection with an investigation as to whether or not unfair competition had been practiced by a corporation or in connection with any charge that it has violated a law or for any other specific purpose, but it is given as a power substantive and absolute in itself. Another power conferred upon the commission is to make public any statement or information which it may obtain in that way. Another power is to recommend to Congress legislation.

Now, does the Senator think that to gratify the mere idle curiosity of this commission or to gratify the public desire for gossip about some corporation Congress can constitutionally confer upon a trade commission power to investigate the books and private papers and documents of all the corporations of the United States, simply because they happen to be engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the able Senator by saying that if I could accept the premises laid down by him as existing here I would answer in the negative, certainly not. But the premises suggested by the able Senator, I must insist, with no desire for levity, are like the expression from The Mikado:

The flowers that bloom in the spring, tra la,
Have nothing to do with the case.

The able Senator can not distinguish one section of the law from the whole act. He can not lop a limb off the tree and say, "There is no tree; I turn my back to the tree; I hold the limb only in my hand," and say, "'Tis all of the tree."

The paragraphs read by the able Senator are paragraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d), and relate to the first four sections of the bill, which specifically set forth that the object of the bill is to protect unfair competition. This commission can never take jurisdiction of anything until there has been put before it in some form the complaint of a violation of the spirit of the act, to wit, of unfair competition by some source somewhere.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, surely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me understand the Senator. Does the Senator think that if we should strike out of the bill section 5 these other powers of the commission to investigate the affairs of corporations and examine their books would go with it?

Mr. LEWIS. My judgment is that section 5 defines the soul of the bill—its object—to wit, to prevent unfair competition; and if you should strike out of the bill the very heart of the bill the body would die.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, as I understand the Senator, if we strike out section 5 from the bill, the power which is conferred upon the commission by section 3, subdivision (b), to require the corporation to produce books and documents, and so on, will disappear. Am I correct?

Mr. LEWIS. If the purpose of the bill justifying the demand for its instrumentalities were excluded, the purpose would end.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is perhaps an answer.

Mr. LEWIS. It may assume what the Senator did not have in his mind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But may I still ask the Senator again whether——

Mr. LEWIS. I may have misapprehended the statement. Will the Senator interrogate me again for the purpose he has in view?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand the Senator, he thinks that this power that I have read, contained in subdivision (b), section 3, is a power to be exercised in connection with an inquiry as to whether or not unfair competition has been practiced.

Mr. LEWIS. That I answer in the affirmative; yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that it is only to be exercised in connection with such an inquiry?

Mr. LEWIS. With some inquiry.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. An inquiry as to whether unfair competition has been practiced.

Mr. LEWIS. Unfair competition, or whether there have been some violations of the other section of the law which compel certain obedience in order to avoid unfair competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not recall any other provision in the bill, but at any rate if the section which defines unfair competition and any other section which there may be in the bill which inhibits a corporation from any particular practice were stricken from the bill does the Senator think that the power conferred by subdivision (b), which I have just read, would fall with those provisions?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator that if there were stricken from the bill the object and purpose for which books and papers could be required, the books and papers could not then be required except for mere curiosity's sake, and for that purpose men's private papers could not be brought before any tribunal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Again let me see if I understand the Senator. One of the powers given to this commission is to make public the facts that they may learn. Does the Senator think the commission may require the production of all books and papers, and so on, in order that what it discovers may be made public?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I answer the Senator. He misapprehends the purport of the bill completely if that is his idea. The matters made public in the bill relate only to those things that have been brought before the commission for one of two purposes, or aid to legislation, which would not be a matter which anyone could complain of, or to demonstrate a violation complained of as touching unfair competition. It does not allow, as I apprehend the bill, that matters may be made public without any regard to any object whatever except publicity.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what I understood the Senator to say before. Then I understand the Senator does not regard the powers conferred by subdivision (b) as being substantive powers in and of themselves.

Mr. LEWIS. I can not so accept them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are only to be exercised in connection with some specific violation of this law on the part of a corporation?

Mr. LEWIS. Some specific complaint of wrong put before the commission.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Some specific complaint of wrongdoing against the terms of the law?

Mr. LEWIS. Such is my conception of the act. Otherwise I could not see its justification. I must say this: I do not hold my views infallible, because I recognize oftentimes on an investigation of things of which I previously had absolute conviction that I had to change my mind.

I recall in Lord Campbell's Lives of the Chief Justices a recitation concerning a fellow named Ezey. He was very interesting, though he was not regarded well at the bar. Lord Eldon, as was his habit, was at one time talking to himself during argument before him—thinking out loud, rather, as he was listening to Ezey's argument. Eldon was overheard, soliloquizing to himself, "What an ass you are, Ezey"; but Ezey proceeded and finally disclosed a capacity that distinguished his argument with logic and conviction. His lordship was heard to say to himself: "Ezey is not such an ass as I thought he was"; and finally Ezey proceeded to disclose an absolute reason for his position and clearly convinced the judge. When in similar soliloquy his lordship muttered: "Egad, it's myself that's the ass." [Laughter.]

I have long since concluded that this particular condition applied to me so frequently that I declined to be arbitrary and to absolutely assert as an irrefutable matter my legal opinion. But in this matter I feel fortified by the labors I have given to the question, by the consideration I have conferred on the bill, and by my investigations of the law and my convictions as to the uses and purposes.

Mr. President, I now turn to the last question, the one upon which able Senators seem to dwell so severely. It is that the words "unfair competition" are of themselves so general that they set it up, as it were, a trap for the allurement and then the destruction of the victim. One would imagine from the able Senators and their particular method of bringing forth the argument against the provision that it was an absolutely unheard-of form of legislation; that we were weaving some form of spiders' enticement of innocent flies, crawling about in all directions, wherein they were to be assembled; that being invited in innocence they were to be finally held enthralled until destroyed, and that there was no method beforehand by which they could be saved.

Or rising to a higher magnitude of expression it is as though we were investing our legislation with something of a Frankenstein having for its object the bringing forth of these victims in hope of relief prior to placing them in this machine of their own creation, to wit, the creation of their agents, but from which they could never be extricated save in their mangled and severed parts or as completely destroyed.

I can not accept that, and I will give to the Senators, with a degree of confidence in which I feel justified, a reason which I fancy they can accept.

Now, what becomes of the able Senator's argument? Take the position, for instance, of my honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] against the word "unfair" or of my very able friend from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Utah, accentuating the views of that Senator on the ground that this is a general clause of confusing uncertainty and ridiculous deformity. The able Senator from Utah produces as an evidence of his erudition and midnight industry a law of China, and he reads the provision of the Chinese law, which provides that if a man should be guilty of some conduct of impropriety he should be lashed 40 lashes; and if the impropriety be great, he should be lashed 80 lashes. Then, says the learned Senator, "Really the distinguished Senator from Nevada, the chairman of this committee, must have investigated the oriental laws, and from those extracted a form of this bill"; and one would have imagined from the gleeful amusement upon the face of his colleagues that the able Senator from Utah had found a marvelous indication of the antiquity of this body or disclosed how it had gone back into the dusty tomes of generations before constitutions were born to bring forth a precedent upon which to put a modern Anglo-Saxon law.

I assure my friend that I appreciate the industry disclosed by his research, and I was really interested in its presentation, but I invite his attention to really what that law was. It may interest the learned Senator. It has nothing to do with China in its original legislation. The law is a copy of the municipal laws prevailing in the cities of London, Sheffield, Manchester, and Leeds, England, which were copied by the commission sent forth at the instance of China by the English lawyers who made for them a little municipal code, except as to form of punishment. They copied the English law touching general disorderly conduct as it applies to every fish market and wharf in the city of London. I likewise advise my friend that that law was not Chinese, but English, and was the mere codification of those laws made by the commission for the Government of China and in the revision reenacted just 18 years ago.

In order that my friend may see how modern that law was I call the learned Senator's attention to the fact that he voted that exact law upon his own people with a very slight change of phraseology. The distinguished Senator put into the code of Alaska which passed this body, with the aid of his able research and labor, in the provisions touching the municipal conduct, a clause not using the word "impropriety," but the word "disorderly."

Likewise here in the District of Columbia I invite his attention to the fact that that very Chinese law to which he alludes applies in Washington City to this day with the single exception that the lashes are not applied, but fine, imprisonment, or hard labor. The lash is not applied. Delaware has been thinking of applying the lash. It has been argued that such should be applicable to the District of Columbia.

What is the law? It is that any person guilty of disorderly conduct shall have either 5 days in jail and pay $10 fine or 30 days in jail and no dollars. If it shall be accompanied with malicious conduct, it shall be 60 days in jail.

Will my able friend tell me where there is a more general word than "disorderly"? What is disorderly? Does it mean a fight with the fist on the street? It may be. Does it mean an affront to a lady in a street car? It may be. Does it mean some misconduct on the sidewalk? It may be. Does it mean any other loud and boisterous conduct? It may be. The general term "disorderly" is no more general than the word "impropriety" as applied to the municipal practices which my learned friend brought forth from China. They are practically all the same.

This substantive law presented here bears no relation whatever to the precedent that my distinguished friend traveled so far to the dynasty of Ming, in China, to obtain. He could have looked to the municipal code of Washington City itself, and also to the code of Alaska, which he helped to pass, to find practically the very same enactment with the very same effect. Now, therefore, we ask the question, What is there in this expression "unfair"? I say to the learned Senators, all my friends, that if you go to equity you find discretion lodged in a judge. If you bring a bill in equity seeking to restrain unfair competition, you do so, when you do, on the ground that competition is oppressive and unjust. Who sits in judgment as to what makes it oppressive? The one human being—the man judge. He decides as to what particular acts enter into the question of oppression. Who decides what is "unfair" and unjust? That particular human being; his discretion determines it. It may be, as the able Senator said in reply to the Senator from Missouri, that the very thing that is considered unfair and unjust to-day under one set of circumstances might by that very same judge in another set of circumstances be not so considered because of the changed situation; yet the law would not deny the right of that chancellor to sit in equity and himself decide whether these particular acts met the definition of the phrases of the law, to wit, "unjust," "oppressive," "unfair," "inequitable," "irreparable injury," and "to the great disadvantage," and similar terms stated in any pleading following special statements of a wrong.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield gladly to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Illinois think that a bill in equity against a defendant for unfair competition would be sufficient as against a demurrer if it simply alleged that the defendant was guilty of unfair competition?

Mr. LEWIS. Recalling Fogg v. Blair (152 United States), a very conclusive decision upon that question, saying that the charge "fraud" was not sufficient without detail, I answer the Senator "no"; but the complaint would be sufficient if it alleged unfair competition and proceeded to set forth wherein it was unfair by stating specific acts—the same as a complaint against "disturbing religious worship." The statute states no definition by particular description, yet the acts charged would have to be set up in the complaint.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely.

Mr. LEWIS. The complaint would have to take the usual form, which would be the common-sense form. It would set forth unfair competition, as charged, and then set forth the details as evidence of the charge, to be thereafter sustained by the proof introduced under the allegations.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If the matters detailed were not prohibited by any substantive law, but were all sanctioned by substantive law, would not the petition then be equally demurrable as it would be if the plaintiff filed no specifications?

Mr. LEWIS. What the Senator means to indicate to me is that the specific acts set forth are acts which have received the sanction of the law?

Mr. REED. Of the present law.

Mr. LEWIS. I would have to say, if they had received the sanction of law they would not be unlawful.

Mr. REED. Can you wipe out a law now existing by a general phrase that has so little meaning that if you employed it in drawing a bill in equity you would have charged nothing, unless you followed it by a specification?

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator from Missouri misapprehends the premise. If the acts set forth were in themselves not unfair competition there would be no reason for the bringing of suit, and we could not conceive of a man doing such an idle thing. If they did constitute unfair competition they would then be lawless and not lawful, and the commission would have jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois gets to this point, that the only thing that will be covered by the term "unfair competition" is that it is to-day illegal. If that be the case, he gets nowhere by the term "unfair competition," because he ends where he starts.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is indulging a proper respect for his own argument, made some weeks ago, wherein he contended that the term "unfair competition" would be limited to those matters which relate to trade-marks involving the imposition of fraud of one merchant by assuming to advertise the goods of one man as really being those of another; but I must say to the able Senator that while that construction was possible in years past, before the present conditions of unfair competition were understood, it is not now the modern conception. If the Senator will be patient with me, I, in a few moments, will bring to his attention what, I feel, will be reasoning from an eminent decision, an eminent authority, which will foreclose that question in his very able mind.

This is what I answer: Suppose the able Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Utah were to-morrow morning forced to bring an action charging duress. What is a more general expression than "duress"? If a person is charged with an offense and is put in prison and while actually impaled within its walls is forced to an act and does it under duress, that we understand would be imprisonment and duress; but the mother of this unfortunate individual could have another individual approach her in her home and tell her that he knew something wrong about her son and that if she did not sign a note of $10,000 the son would be delivered to the officers of the law and imprisoned and disgraced and dishonored. There is no imprisonment in that case, but it likewise is duress. Yet there is no imprisonment or even laying hands on the person. Another person may be given to understand that if he does not do a certain thing influence will be exercised by which he will lose his position here in Washington. He yields to the threat and fear and promises the thing sought. That likewise is duress. Shall it be said that there shall be no remedy against duress because every form of definition of duress that the mind might conceive as coming within duress could not be specifically detailed in the statute or law using the word "duress"?

Mr. REED. May I call the Senator's attention to a fact?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Every act which the Senator has now specified as constituting duress is illegal; aside from coming within the definition of duress, it is against the law itself. Applying that to the colloquy which has just passed, if you use the term "unfair," and it carries with it no meaning sufficient to sustain a bill, and if you then file a specification, then unless the things you specify are illegal you have gained nothing by employing the term "unfair," and if they are illegal they are illegal because of the present substantive law. Therefore, when the Senator has recourse to the term "duress," he, I think, avoids the question—of course, he means to be perfectly candid—because the word "duress" in the law has a fixed meaning.

It has been held always to embrace the particular acts the Senator has specified and all that class of acts. Hence, when you prohibit duress, you prohibit all that class of acts, because the word has a fixed meaning.

The question, then, comes, of course, whether the term "unfair" has that fixed meaning. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I wish the Senator would tell us now what is included in the term "unfair competition," as he would construe it. I am interested. If I have been wrong, I want to be convinced.

Mr. LEWIS. My able friend flatters me with a concession, affording me great delight when he indicates that I could convince him; so this much, I will admit, I have in my mind, that the Senator from Missouri fails to distinguish between the thing that is unlawful because it is wrongful and the thing that is unlawful because there has been some specific act of legislation or previous decision of courts declaring against it. When I use the word "unlawful" in connection with "unfair competition," I mean that kind of acts which by the rules of reason, common sense, and justice are wrongful.

My able friend says that my definition of duress carried with it some legal definition of duress. I beg to say that I use the last illustration to convey just the contrary. Where is there any law against one intimating that he had influence enough to have another removed from a political position, and by that means secure from him a kind of promise or obedience? There is no law against that anywhere. The intruder may never have such influence; he may never exercise such influence; and yet the individual threatened might not be aware of that fact.

Mr. REED. But I think the Senator avoids the question.

Mr. LEWIS. I am reaching it.

Mr. REED. There is plenty of law against duress. The word "duress" has a specific meaning in the law; it has been defined thousands of times, and it covers all that class of coercion which deprives an individual of his freedom of action and which is calculated to compel him to do something against his will. I do not mean that is an absolutely accurate legal definition but that expresses it; the word has that meaning. When we apply it in the law it covers that class of acts, just as if you used the term "fraud" or "fraudulent," all of which have been defined.

The whole question between the Senator from Illinois and myself and other Senators seems to resolve itself into this: Has the term "unfair competition," aside from the restricted meaning which the books have given it, another meaning so definite that when you employ it you reach certain kinds of conduct? If it has, I have granted from the first it can be employed in this act. If it does not have such a meaning, then, of course, we are left to the conjecture of the reader as to what it covers. That is the real point between us.

The Senator from Illinois is not flattered at all by my saying that he might convince me. I have not stood here opposing legislation of this kind, but I have stood here insisting that when we do pass a bill we shall pass one that will stand the test. It may be that the general term will stand the test; but I am anxious to know what the Senator now includes, or what he thinks would be included, in the term "unfair competition."

Mr. LEWIS. I meant, Mr. President, when I said my able friend flattered me, knowing him to be so eminent a lawyer, that I felt flattered that he should assume that I, who mingle so many other things with whatever I am as a lawyer, should be able to really convince one whom I recognize as a specialist.

I remind him as I revert for a little relief to the Senators from a dry legal argument to Brizzolari, the Italian wit and student, who used an illustration which has been partly appropriated by one of our American humorists. He said he had often heard the ancient expression that "the half was better than the whole," but he never understood it until he contemplated painters, and then he recalled that there was Raphael, who was only a painter, but he was a much greater man than some painters he knew who were both painters and glaziers. [Laughter.]

I am in this position: My distinguished friend is a very able lawyer, and specialist as such, while I have been obsessed to a great degree with what I think are the purposes and objects to society of the bill, and may for that reason be largely commingling too many matters in my legal construction. This is my direct answer to the Senator, and I shall for a few minutes elaborate it, I hope to his greater satisfaction: The phrase "unfair competition," to which we are now alluding, in the sense in which we use it in the bill will be construed by the courts to mean that which in its general sense it is now understood at the time of the enactment to mean in the ordinary usage of the term in connection with business affairs. That such will be arrived at by recourse to the late decisions, where courts have adopted such expressions, certainly within the last five years.

It is true that originally the term had a limited application, but that limited application was originally applied to many other phrases which now have a much more enlarged significance, such as the word "undue" or the word "restraint." Then I come to the question how would we reach the definition of the phrase "unfair competition" unless we adopt those particular things which are now regarded, or heretofore have been regarded, as coming within its meaning? Can we imagine a more general clause than "due process of law"? Who shall define "due process of law"? Where is the definition specifically? I ask my brother lawyers how would you get at it? You would be compelled to accept the views urged by the Supreme Court of the United States, which, in a late case reported in Two hundred and thirty-second United States, say:

> This court has recognized the difficulty of satisfactorily defining in general terms which shall apply to all cases what is meant by the term "due process of law" and the desirability of judicial determination upon each case as the questions arise. Davidson v. New Orleans (96 U. S., 97). If the exercise of judicial power be such "as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs," there has been no deprivation of due process of law.

I am therefore strongly impressed with the idea that here we have a complete parallel and that if "unfair competition" shall be so construed and applied by those to whom its construction is committed within the light of the reason of business affairs, then such does no wrong. There is no discrimination by definition of reaching one set of unfair acts and exempting or omitting others. We thus carry out equitably the definition as it is understood in the business world. There we have all the definition demanded. It is impossible to have a specific definition of everything that in detail would constitute unfair competition set forth in a law.

Now, I ask my learned friend's attention to what I feel will have some influence with him. There seem to have been overlooked some observations by the Supreme Court of the United States. I need not say to the able lawyers around me how we have evolved various expressions and senses used in the law.

The words "due restraint" and "undue restraint of trade" once had a certain limited and defined meaning. Then, in the case referred to by the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Knight case, the court gave them a rather restricted meaning. We recall how in the trans-Missouri case, previously, a still further restricted meaning was given to them; but gradually the courts began to realize that there were conditions in this country which had to be met by general legislation, and that the citizen had to know that a general phrase which he understood in the private affairs of his life would be accepted within the meaning of the law; that the law would be applied to him to the full extent of that meaning, as he applied it to himself and to his neighbor in ordinary affairs, man to man; that there was no other way to have a definition of the general policy of the dealings between mankind in matters such as relate to commercial intercourse is apparent. All because commerce has increased, science has expanded, invention has multiplied, new conditions surround us, everything forced upon us a situation under which it would be impossible to enumerate the expressions of these changed and added conditions unless one had the category of all eternity, the different forms and methods which might be applied. Consequently general phraseology, not apt because of legal scientific application, but apt because of its general homely understanding. This has become to be a criterion of the law; and among these criteria of general phrases was this particular one of "unfair," a general clause touching the trade affairs of man, employed and adopted because of the growth of the necessity.

The Supreme Court of the United States, our final arbiter, had before it the argument that the word "restraint" did not define. It was urged in reply that "restraint of trade" had been defined in past decisions in one way, but that now new conditions were brought before the court that were not within its contemplation at the time of the previous definition, and these new conditions were to be embraced in the definition. This was met with the rejoinder that such would probably have an ex post facto effect and create a criminal of one who only a few years before, by similar conduct, was regarded as being in a legitimate or certainly a licensed business. The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through a very learned member of that body, Mr. Justice White, as Chief Justice, considered all these views and changes, and agreed to the necessity of accepting this form of change in order to work the best will of mankind along general lines through and along these lines because there was no other way in which plain justice could be done to plain American civilization.

Keep in mind, sirs, as I have given expression in my wandering parenthesis, that there must be in the minds of legislators, as there surely was in the minds of the courts, that a Government, founded as is ours upon the discretion of its manhood, because it is a Government directly deriving its powers from the consent of those who are governed, such government is compelled to expand to the necessities of the hour to meet the thing consented to, therefore directed, all in order to prevent revolt by those who can otherwise obtain no relief, to avoid insurrection within, riot from without, and destruction of liberty, to the death of freedom. To achieve this, here and there mankind must surrender something of the individual protection it had and the personal security in assurance of exactness of law which had been previously theirs, and for society's sake take a risk and wander forth on the broad highway of human need to ascertain what would be the rights of their fellow men, where the particular citizen would invade them, and beyond which they might not go, to ascertain within what general limits they should serve and sacrifice in order to preserve the general rights of their fellow men. Without this general concession to man, without this general duty imposed upon man, without this consciousness embedded in the soul of him, there could be no free government, because government would be by rule of words, not by rule of reason, by the letter which killeth when the spirit maketh the law. Consequently, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through human beings, ordained by the people to speak their will for the Government, and from reason springing from the soul, came to the conclusion that mankind must be not only borne along with the tide of advance, but must yield to inexorable conditions that call for a mutual surrender of exactness, in order that there would not be the oppression born of limitations. It is such that would lead to revolt of reason and destruction of government. For that reason modern society recognizes the process of growth and moves, ruling mankind, as it were, into the niches of the wall that lines the route of advance and ordered this official to hold his place, that he may salute the passing procession of time with its changes and to pay his obeisance to the demands of new needs and adopt the commanded innovations essential to established rights and universal justice. I also invite Senators to consider that the kind of thing charged in the Standard Oil case is of the very thing which we call "unfair competition." These had not at the time of the enactment of the words "restraint of trade" been so understood, as comprehended in the general expression. The question was, Could the phase now be said to have moved forward with the change of conditions and apply to the new condition, and the new condition to be held violated if such becomes an infraction of the law; or does the general law meet the new condition? In other words, that, if violating the general law, the new condition is to be held within the act or without the act because of no specific definition of such. Then, said Mr. Justice White:

We shall endeavor then first to seek their meaning, not by indulging in an elaborate and learned analysis of the English law and of the law of this country, but by making a very brief reference to the elementary and indisputable conceptions of both the English and American law on the subject prior to the passage of the antitrust act.

Then he enters into a general discussion of the legislation of the English race, coming to our own:

In this country also the acts from which it was deemed there resulted a part, if not all, of the injurious consequences ascribed to monopoly came to be referred to as a monopoly itself. In other words, here, as had been the case in England, practical common sense caused attention to be concentrated, not upon the theoretically correct name to be given to the condition or acts which gave rise to a harmful result, but to the result itself and to the remedying of the evils which it produced. The statement just made is illustrated by an early statute of the Province of Massachusetts—that is, chapter 31 of the laws of 1778–79, by which monopoly and forestalling were expressly treated as one and the same thing.

Then, proceeding, he says what I beg to say ratifies my reasoning:

It will be found that as modern conditions arose the trend of legislation and judicial decision came more and more to adapt the recognized restrictions to new manifestations of conduct or of dealing which it was thought justified the inference of intent to do the wrongs which it had been the purpose to prevent from the beginning. The evolution is clearly pointed out in National Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas (197 U. S., 115) and Shawnee Compress Co. v. Anderson (209 U. S., 423); and, indeed, will be found to be illustrated in various aspects by the decisions of this court which have been concerned with the enforcement of the act we are now considering.

Without going into detail and but very briefly surveying the whole field, it may be, with accuracy, said that the dread of enhancement of prices and of other wrongs which it was thought would flow from the undue limitation on competitive conditions caused by contracts or other acts of individuals or corporations, led, as a matter of public policy, to the prohibition or treating as illegal all contracts or acts which were unreasonably restrictive of competitive conditions, either from the nature or character of the contract or act or where the surrounding circumstances were such as to justify the conclusion that they had not been entered into or performed with the legitimate purpose of reasonably forwarding personal interest and developing trade, but, on the contrary, were of such a character as to give rise to the inference or presumption that they had been entered into or done with the intent to do wrong to the general public and to limit the right of individuals, thus restraining the free flow of commerce and tending to bring about the evils, such as enhancement of prices, which were considered to be against public policy. It is equally true to say that the survey of the legislation in this country on this subject from the beginning will show, depending as it did upon the economic conceptions which obtained at the time when the legislation was adopted or judicial decision was rendered, that contracts or acts were at one time deemed to be of such a character as to justify the inference of wrongful intent which were at another period thought not to be of that character. But this again, as we have seen, simply followed the line of development of the law of England.

I may omit reading the portions of the decision which do not relate to the point which I wish to press upon your attention. Says the court upon this question of general definition:

The merely generic enumeration which the statute makes of the acts to which it refers and the absence of any definition of restraint of trade as used in the statute leaves room for but one conclusion, which is that it was expressly designed not to unduly limit the application of the act by precise definition, but while clearly fixing a standard—that is, by defining the ulterior boundaries which could not be transgressed with impunity—to leave it to be determined by the light of reason, guided by the principles of law and the duty to apply and enforce the public policy embodied in the statute in every given case, whether any particular act or contract was within the contemplation of the statute.

I am unable to observe, by any line of reasoning, a stronger fortification or a more forcible justification within law for the provision I urge than this which the highest body of our law gives us, as justified in law by the general form of general statement, we have here given us reason for the advance of the law justifying such expanding application.

One more reference to this opinion and I have done. I call the attention of my very able friend from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to it.

Yet—

Says the court—

let us demonstrate that which needs no demonstration, by a few obvious examples. Take, for instance, the familiar cases where the judiciary is called upon to determine whether a particular act or acts are within a given prohibition, depending upon wrongful intent. Take questions of fraud. Consider the power which must be exercised in every case where the courts are called upon to determine whether particular acts are invalid which are, abstractly speaking, in and of themselves valid, but which are asserted to be invalid because of their direct effect upon interstate commerce.

And the court, reasoning therefrom, says that these particular acts must be ascertained, and from them must be derived whether they serve the general definition of that restraint.

It seems to me, therefore, that the argument made that the act is unconstitutional from all the positions taken by the able Senators is answered—not by me, do I assume, but answered by the decisions of the highest arbiter we have, and answered to such a degree that no man need have serious doubt as to the duty of giving to the public this law.

Now, I say to my able friends on the other side of this Chamber a parting word: I hear a great deal from time to time about the pressure of the President upon us to pass this legislation, and that other constant invocation, invoking us to freedom from such restraint. I would impress upon this able body this thought that is in my mind: If this Government is to endure to the objects for which it is founded, it can do so only by the conception that all representatives are bound by the declaration of their masters—the people—when such direction is given by that people. When the people voted at the last election that there should be a change in the affairs political of this country, and gave to the party at present in power a commission to execute certain laws of relief, they gave that commission, as the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] well said yesterday, to the whole of the public representatives. There are no exceptions in the case of my able friends on the other side. In the platforms of all the political parties, as has been pointed out, there was at least the expression of the spirit demanding this form of relief. The agonies suffered by our people for years cried for relief. The persecutions endured by commerce demanded that they should be stopped. The embarrassments—aye, more, the disgrace—the criminal experiences visited upon the Republic by those who heedlessly and defiantly violated every law of justice and equity in this Republic for years, all demanded the reform. We had come to a point where the patience of mankind had ceased. There was disrespect of the law exhibited throughout every avenue of life, and a threat of absolutely overturning the courts, because of the want of reverence for and obedience to their decrees. This all called for a remedy. That call was answered in the declaration that came from the people asking for some law, and then demanding that there be created a tribunal which should execute that law, some instrumentality that could summarily enforce it. One in its existence that would tender an assurance to the hearts of the people that their rights were to be rescued and preserved. It is that which is demanded in this hour.

The eminent Senators on the other side should realize the mandate sent to them, for when the people decreed that they should have this relief it was a decree to all of the representatives to obey it. It will not do for able men who merely differ from some line of this bill, some technical expression of this bill, to find in that refuge an exemption from the duty they owe to aid in carrying out the will of the people who trusted us here to give them the form of relief long before the present administration was put in power. For such the people had declared in different forms of protest. These came from every street corner and alley, from every counting house and exchange, from every court and rostrum, wherever the will of the public could be voiced.

Mr. President, I am strongly of opinion that it were better, indeed, to give to the public the benefit of a doubt, that we may give them security in conscience, nobler to give them the feeling that they have protection and guidance from their representatives, and that this honorable body does not stand long upon the technical methods by which they may avoid a public duty; that they will not resort to the guise that a law may not be as exact as they would have it, but that we should rather look to the spirit of the purpose and give relief to mankind, in order that we may not have—as I now answer my able friend from Missouri—that form of unfair competition which he defined as being the opinions of the Supreme Court of his country touching the Harvester Trust, and what he charged to be their manifold wrongs upon this country. From his arraignment there was defined as both unfair and unjust conduct in detail. He takes a quiet consolation that by virtue of his splendid argument he demonstrated what was really unfair competition. That by his flaming pillory my particular constituent, Mr. Jones, need not have hope for public elevation from this body.

My learned and distinguished friend from Missouri, constituting one of the "three musketeers," composed of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and the able Senator from Nebraska, made it absolutely impossible for any man not to understand that "unfair competition" within this law means all those hideous and indescribable wrongs portrayed by him with livid tongue when he was flashing forth his charged reasons for objection to Mr. Jones in respect to his nomination as a member of the Federal Reserve Board.

I say, more seriously, that I hold that "unfair competition" means that course of conduct which undermines a man by misrepresenting him and his methods by seeking to obtain advantages through rebate systems through private contracts—"tying" contracts, as they are sometimes called—or by any other form of competition which places the individual at such a disadvantage that he can not obtain equal rights in transportation, equal opportunities in the city where he lives, equal opportunities for trade and sale, or any other form of conduct which would be so oppressive and unjust in its application as would be entitled, under the law of humanity, to be designated unfair.

That is my answer. Such is the purpose of this law. It is submitted to the common sense and the justice of men who, upon their solemn oaths, with their responsibility to God in heaven, and with their due sense of justice to mankind on earth, will not be presumed to be different from any other just mankind in dealing out to their fellow men equal and exact justice. This is the object of the law, and for this I speak. May it survive its assailants and be long preserved as a blessing to our countrymen.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of introducing some bills? It will take no time whatever.

Mr. REED. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if unanimous consent is asked, I shall have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection.

Mr. REED. I am going to occupy the floor only a few moments, and after I have concluded every one can get his bills in.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from Illinois for his polite characterization of myself and two other Senators as "Three Musketeers." I do not desire to bring up the unpleasantness of the Jones case nor to draw out of the grave a corpse that was well buried and ought to be allowed to sleep.

If the Senator is no more accurate in his law than he is in his history he should not be followed blindly hereafter. He told us a moment ago that the Chinese law quoted by the Senator from Utah was written 18 years ago by English jurists, carried to China, and adopted in a municipal code. Unfortunately for that statement—and I have not undertaken to trace the history of it very far, as it is not sufficiently interesting to require any exhaustive examination—I find that the reference which the Senator read is in the Thirty-fifth Federal Reporter and is quoted in a case that was decided 26 years ago; so it hardly could have been written 18 years ago by an Englishman, carried to China, and then adopted.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator wholly misunderstood me. I specifically stated that my friend had gone back into the dusty tomes and had gotten a municipal regulation which had been reincorporated by an English commission and put into their municipal code 18 years ago. It is a mere matter of disorderly conduct provision.

Mr. REED. I thought I heard the Senator accurately.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely meant to intimate that it was adopted in a modern day as well as an ancient one. The English act had to be written in Chinese and then translated for our tongue into English.

Mr. REED. I also find in a book by Mr. Francis Lieber, the second edition of which was published in 1839, this reference to that same law, at page 156:

> There is a law in the Chinese penal code, as translated by Sir George Staunton—

In other words, an Englishman translated a Chinese book. He did not write an English book and translate it into Chinese. He took a Chinese book and translated it into English—> a work which has many praiseworthy traits—that may fairly be considered as a model of ambiguous laws, to which all others approach, more or less. The Chinese code says, "Whoever is guilty of improper conduct and such as is contrary to the spirit of the laws, though not a breach of any specific article, shall be punished, at the least, with 40 blows; and when the impropriety is of a serious nature, with 80 blows." This is a law—> clearly emanating from the spirit which pervades the whole Chinese Empire, that the Emperor is the father, the whole country but a family—a principle which necessarily always leads to absolutism and tyranny, the moment we go beyond the family, in which affection, not legal rule, gives the measure of justice; while personal affection can not form a fundamental principle where personal connection ceases, and Government acts by delegation, as I have endeavored to show ere this. This ambiguous and dangerous law would be, in its spirit of discretionary power, not in its form of discipline, a perfectly proper family rule.

Now, I am unwilling, even if the Senator's modified statement be correct, even if an Englishman translated a Chinese law which suited the Chinese people, to impose that kind of Chinese jurisprudence upon the American people or to follow the illustrious example.

I am anxious that the question whether section 5 be sound shall be settled, and I am anxious that it shall be settled right, because there is not in the Senate of the United States a single man who can more earnestly than myself desire that all those oppressive, dishonest, dishonorable practices by which monopoly has extended its power shall be prohibited. Senators get nowhere by impugning the motives of those who refuse to accept the particular phraseology they have advanced. You might as well say, if a patient be sick and needs physic, that a man is an enemy of the patient who insists that he shall not be bled to death, as to say that a man is an enemy of proper legislation because he insists that the legislation, when it is drawn, shall be in accordance with the Constitution, to the end that it may not turn to ashes upon the lips of those who have promulgated it.

I want to see these oppressive practices stopped. Hence I want to define them so that when we have written a law it will do the work we intend it to do, and not be discovered in the end to have accomplished nothing. I do not think I put myself among the friends of monopolies and trusts and combinations because I have the temerity to suggest that the language now employed is not sufficiently specific, definite, and certain, and, therefore, that it ought to be made clear.

Neither have I ever said, by direction or indirection, by innuendo, by expression of countenance, or otherwise that we must specifically define in this bill every act of unfair trade or the law will be invalid. I have said that you must either specifically describe the acts or you must lay down some general principle which will enable a court to decide whether a particular act comes within that principle. I have argued that the term "unfair competition" either has a meaning so restricted as that it will not embrace the acts of which we complain and under which we suffer, or else that it is a term with no definite meaning, and, being a term with no definite meaning, it will not reach any act; for a court or a commission can not be allowed simply to exercise their discretion and judgment with reference to whether, in their opinion, a thing is right or wrong, for that is the substitution of opinion government for government by the law and the Constitution.

I regret that my friend should undertake even for a minute to classify all those who insist that the law shall contain a proper definition as opposed to the enactment of any law, or assumes that because we are not contented with the language of this bill we are therefore enamored of the evil practices which the bill probably is meant to reach. I say "probably," because nobody reading it can tell, and nobody following this debate can tell just what the law is intended to punish.

I have heard a number of Senators ask the question I asked the Senator from Illinois: "Please define 'unfair competition'"; and I have heard as many definitions as there have been answers. The best definition I have heard came from the lips of the Senator from Illinois near the close of his remarks; and if the Senator from Illinois would substitute for the first two clauses of section 5 the language he employed in his definition he would undoubtedly have a law sufficiently definite to constitute rule of action, and that could, in my opinion, be enforced by courts. I say "undoubtedly"; I hesitate ever to say that a question is beyond doubt, but that is my judgment.

The trouble is, the authors of this bill and the sponsors for it stand, I had almost said, stubbornly saying that they will not dot an "i" nor stroke a "t" nor write in any kind of definition, and then they accuse all who differ from them of being in conspiracy, not in restraint of trade, but in restraint of any and all remedial legislation.

Then, I am just a trifle wearied by the oft-repeated arguments, made here at different times, that when the interstate-commerce bill was being discussed some Senators thought it was unconstitutional; ergo, every man is foreclosed hereafter so that he may not be heard to declare that any other law is unconstitutional. "The argument was made once and was not in that instance sound. Consequently," say these learned gentlement, "it can never again be made."

Following that logic to its legitimate conclusion, no one can now appeal to the Constitution, because it was once falsely invoked. Consequently, we no longer have a Constitution. Yet that has been the line of argument followed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and the intellectual meanderings of the Senator from New Hampshire were carefully tracked by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The Constitution has been invoked on thousands of occasions where the courts have afterwards said the Constitution was not at all violated. On the other hand, it has been invoked thousands of times where the courts have said that it was properly appealed to. You can not settle the right or wrong of this question by crying aloud from the housetops that at some other time, with reference to some other law, some other Senators thought the Constitution was being violated when it was not.

The whole question comes back to whether or not we are now violating the Constitution; and no light is thrown upon that question by the mistakes or by the wisdom of the opinions of other men at other times, with reference to whether other laws were unconstitutional.

We shall gain nothing here if at this time, when public opinion is ripe and pressing for remedial legislation, we adopt something which turns out to be of no force or validity. We shall have abandoned the field; the opportunity will have gone; and a year or two years or four or five years from now we shall find that we adjourned without doing anything. The entire argument of my friend from Illinois that we ought to resolve doubts in favor of the people might well be made if the law had been enacted and if it was all there was to protect the people. If he were standing before a court, he might make that sort of appeal, although it would not be a very forceful one to make to a court, unless it were the court of a justice of the peace. We are sitting here now, however, to write the law; and if we have not wisdom enough to write a law, how can we suppose, out of our intellectual vagaries and failures, a commission is to construct a law? We would better remain here until we adjourn for the Christmas holidays working out the problem of section 5 than to adopt it if it accomplishes nothing.

I have no patience with that kind of argument.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Can the Senator say how many substitutes for or amendments to section 5 have been offered for consideration since the bill was reported?

Mr. REED. I can not. I have not undertaken to keep track of them.

When I rose I did not intend to take more than three or four minutes; but, since I am on my feet, I call the attention of my friend from Illinois, who is always fair, and particularly fair to me—he could not be otherwise; he could not be unfair to one who so much loves and admires him—to the fact that when I was discussing the case of a particular trust, which shall be nameless here as far as I am concerned, I called the attention of the Senator who is in charge of this bill to the various acts catalogued there for the purpose of pointing out to him the fact that here was a very catalogue of oppressive practices, and that every one of them had been condemned by the court as illegal because they were parts of a general scheme to restrain trade, and that if he wanted to catalogue them in a bill he had here an encyclopedia which probably embraced every practice known to the gentlemen who progagate monopolies or engage in restraint of trade.

I have not the slightest doubt, however, that if the Senator from Illinois will take the very definition he gave and, working it over with care, put it in section 5, thus defining "unfair competition" substantially as he here defined it, we will have an act under which many of the abuses complained of can be reached.

With reference to my alleged opposition I have this to say: I came into the Senate one day and found section 5 under discussion. It looked as though it might pass at that time. I made some desultory remarks upon it without any special preparation. At a later time I discussed the phrase "unfair competition," endeavoring to show that it does have a restricted meaning, and that if you adopted it in this law without qualifying that meaning the courts will probably follow that restricted meaning, and thus we would have a law at the end of all our labors which simply reached the substitution of the goods of "A" for the goods of "B." I knew that was not the purpose of the author of this act, hence I called attention to the defect. I am surprised to find myself suddenly catalogued here as an enemy of remedial legislation.

The difference between some of my friends and myself is that I am willing to stay here all summer, if need be, to perfect a law so that it will accord with the Constitution, believing that if it accords with the Constitution we will have a law that protects the liberties of the American people. If, however, we make a law that violates the Constitution, we will have done a stupid thing, and if we shall have done it deliberately we will have violated our oaths of office.

I do not pretend to say that I am necessarily right. I may be mistaken in my view. The courts may undertake to define "unfair competition" for themselves, but I think that is the province of the legislative body.

Mr. President, suppose we were to use this term and a court should undertake to find what it means. Suppose the court should proceed according to the theory of the gentlemen who advocate section 5. The court would go back to the common law and find the term "unfair competition" related simply to those practices by which one man substitutes his goods for those of another. The court would then wander through all the decisions that have been made, and wherever it found a court had in any decision employed the term "unfair competition" arguendo and as a mere descriptive phrase, write that down also as included within the term "unfair competition." The court would also turn to the statutes of the various States in which the term "unfair competition" is employed for more light. Here the court would find that for the most part those statutes had described as "unfair competition" the sale of goods in one community at a less price than is being charged by the same concern in another community. Unfortunately the court would find also that the term had in many instances been used to cover many other practices and devices, so that when it took the statutes as a guide they would be confronted by some 18 or 20 different definitions of "unfair competition."

Then the court should, according to these gentlemen, read through the works of all the writers on economy, and I suppose we might include in that the modern magazine writers, ex-presidential and otherwise. In this fruitful field the court would find hundreds of different things embraced with the expression "unfair trade." Out of this labyrinth of contrariety the court is to be expected to evolve a rule of law. The fact would be that, instead of finding a definite meaning which would make definite the law, the court would be faced by as many different meanings as there were decisions, statutes, and writers. Consequently the commission would have no rule to go by, and if it proceeded to do anything it would have no guide save its own opinion as to what was fair and unfair.

Now, there is something to be considered beside the commission, and that is the people of the United States. The great difference between an absolute monarchy and a republic, after all, is found in the fact that under a despotism the question of what is legal or illegal reposes in the brain of one man. He can declare an act legal or illegal as he thinks it is right or wrong, and the citizens, even in the most benighted and enslaved countries history tells us of, even in the most tyrannical, have always, at least, been favored by the decree of the tyrant, and have had some opportunity to know what that decree was, to the end that they might conform to it.

But, nevertheless, the source of the law was the will of the despot. The question as to what was right and what was wrong was settled by the will of one man. Whereas in a free country the citizen has the right to have a rule written down that applies to him and to every other citizen alike, and having that rule of the law he then has the opportunity of observing it. He knows what his rights are and he knows when he is doing wrong. But if you have no rule of law and erect a tribunal empowered to say what is right and what is wrong, the citizen no longer can tell what is right or what is wrong until that tribunal has spoken with reference to his particular act. In other words, you have wiped out the government of law and substituted for it a government by individuals.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I have been following the remarks of the Senator with great interest, particularly that part in which he stated that it would be necessary to go to the works of economists and magazine writers and other sources of information of that character to ascertain what is meant by the expression "unfair competition." But are we not confronted with exactly the same condition of affairs with reference to every word and phrase which we put into a law? If we put a phrase into a law, we go to dictionaries, or go to encyclopedias, we go to the works of standard writers, and we go to every source that we can to understand what the expression signifies and whether it does, indeed, cover a certain state of facts or not. What is the difference?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is just the difference between expressing an idea in plain words and not expressing an idea at all. There is the difference between writing a rule of conduct and not writing a rule of conduct. The Senator from Montana, for whose opinion I entertain the most profound regard, astounds me by his question. Everybody knows that there are limitations to the human tongue. Everybody knows that we can not with the degree of accuracy possible when we may weigh an article in the balances be able to express an idea.

But that does not avoid the proposition that before you can have a law you must within the limits of our speech fairly express an idea. Neither is there anything in the argument adduced that because we have employed certain words and phrases in our laws which are short and terse thereby we have established the principle that we need not write a rule of conduct. In every instance cited, even in the opinion read by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], where terms have been employed in a law without explanatory context the word has had a meaning in the law. It has always been defined, and it has been so thoroughly defined that when it was employed in the law all people could understand at least the nature and character of the thing that was to be prohibited or permitted.

I will refer briefly to that. If we say in a law "Any man convicted of burglary shall not be permitted thereafter to exercise the privilege of suffrage," we do not need to write into that statute a definition of burglary, and why? Because burglary is already defined. Its meaning is known. It is defined in other statutes. Therefore when we use the term "burglary" we incorporate the definition with the word. But if burglary never had been defined either by a court or by a statute, and if it had no fixed meaning in the English tongue, and you employed it, then what would you have? Would you have a law? Could you turn such a statute over to a board and let the board say that it meant whatever the board pleased to have it mean?

When we come to the phrase so often referred to in this discussion, "restraint of trade," which is discussed by Mr. Justice White in the opinion frequently cited, I have no hesitation in saying that the lawyer who reads that opinion, and reads it candidly, who wipes the dust from his glasses and sits down to determine what is the fundamental thought running through the reasoning of Justice White, he will come to the conclusion that the court held that the term "restraint of trade" had been for years well defined in the law. He will find that originally it had been employed with reference to certain restricted and particular acts, but that the principle embraced within the term at that time was the same principle which, being gradually extended, was held to reach other acts, and that that same fundamental thought and principle which was there from the first, and which constituted the soul of the rule and of the term, was broad enough to cover and embrace the particular new devices and new practices which had been set up and which were being attacked in the case then pending before the Supreme Court.

If the term "unfair competition" had such a fixed meaning in the law, if it was held to embrace the character of the things which the Senator from Illinois defined when he gave his definition, then the adoption of it here would be unobjectionable; but no one has found a law book giving any such definition, and no such law book can be produced, in my opinion. On the contrary, we find a meaning given whenever we touch the law books which utterly fails to embrace the acts we now seek to prohibit.

I call the attention of my very distinguished friend from Montana, and I break no confidence, I trust, when I say that he tells me he wrote the Montana statute on unfair competition. Very well. When he sat down in his room as a lawyer and wrote that statute he did not write "unfair competition is hereby prohibited," as is now proposed, but being a lawyer, as he is every inch of him, he proceeded to define unfair competition in the most explicit terms.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator scarcely states it with accuracy. I was not endeavoring in the framing of that statute to aim at every practice in trade that might properly be denominated as unfair competition, making one sweeping generalization to condemn them all. We were seeking simply to make penal one particular practice which had some local significance, and it was that particular act which we declared to be penal.

But it is exceedingly significant, Mr. President, that we denounced that particular practice as unfair competition; and I find that in the State of California, for instance, they denounce certain other practices and penalize them, and characterize those as unfair competition. In the State of South Dakota they denounce certain other practices and penalize them, and they denounce them as unfair competition. When a statute is passed denouncing, in general terms, all unfair competition, may we not properly go to these various statutes to gather from them the idea as to what the legislature meant and what Congress meant by denouncing unfair competition in general terms?

Now that I am speaking about that, I should like to understand, if I could clearly, the position taken by the Senator from Missouri. I undertake to say that he does not hold that this is unconstitutional. It does not offend, so far as I have been able to follow him, any provision of the Constitution. If it is not unconstitutional it simply becomes a question of construction. When the matter comes before the court it is simply a question as to what the Congress of the United States did mean when it said "unfair competition."

If I gather the Senator aright, he means to assert now that the court will be obliged to say, "We are helpless; we do not know what the Congress of the United States meant when it used that term." There are certain acts brought to our attention, as price cutting, "tying" contracts, bogus independent corporations. Various things of that kind are brought to our attention. We are asked to say whether these acts will fall within the significance of the term "unfair competition" as used by the Congress of the United States, and if I gather the Senator aright, he says the court will be obliged to say, "We do not know."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, why should not I say the court will be obliged to say, "We do not know," when there is not a single Senator who can write his definition and say what he means now. How is the court to know what our inner consciousness is when we can not disclose it ourselves or write it in a statute?

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand the Senator's contention to be that a statute must fall because of its insensibility?

Mr. REED. My position is that the statute would fall, because it is absolutely indefinite and because whoever undertakes to act under it is acting, not in accordance with the rule of law laid down, but is simply left to follow the rule of his own reason, and that whenever you can clothe any tribunal with the power to interfere with a citizen's property or property rights, and you do not back that with a law, but simply leave it to the discretion of an individual, then you have violated the Constitution of the United States, for you are depriving the citizen of his property without due process of law; indeed, without any law whatever.

But, Mr. President, the Senator has made a statement here which I can not believe, on sober reflection, he will adhere to; that is, when a court comes to construe the term "unfair competition," finding that it is defined in Montana in one way, finding that it is defined in South Dakota another way, finding that it is defined in California another way, and finding that it is defined in 20 different States in 20 different ways, that the court will say that it embraces all of the definitions; that it means all that all of the statutes added together mean. It seems to me the court would say, "The term has no meaning; it means one thing in one place, another thing in another place, another thing in a third place, and so on ad infinitum. Therefore, when it is employed in this way by Congress, we can not tell what it means or what Congress intended."

Let me call my learned friend's attention to this: I want him to put himself in his office with his client. The client comes to him and asks him whether he can do a certain thing in the management of his business. He looks up the laws of his own State; then he turns to the statutes of the United States—the only laws that can possibly affect his client being the laws of his own State and the laws of the United States. When he gets to the term "unfair competition" I can not imagine my friend saying to his client, "I do not know what that means, but we will see what it means. I will read the law of South Dakota, and, if I find it means one thing, I will then read the law of California, and, if I find it means another thing, I will then read the law of Montana, and, if I find it means another thing, I will then be sure that the term 'unfair competition' means all of those things."

Now, if the term "unfair competition" embraces all those things, there is an easy way out of it; that is, to take all of the acts denounced in the statutes of those States and write them in here, and not leave the citizen to go meandering through the law libraries of the country to find what the legislature of some other State has enacted.

But let me follow that. If the laws now enacted by these States in which they each give their own definition of what they are pleased to term "unfair competition" are to be the guide of the courts, then it seems to me that the laws that will be enacted hereafter might just as well be embraced, so that any State would hereafter have the power to amend the laws of the United States by amending the statutes of that State. That will not do.

I do not believe there is any well-settled law to the effect that in construing any statute of the United States you must take into consideration the statutes of the States. You take into consideration the decisions of our States upon statutes that are similar and give them such weight as you see fit, but it has never been held that when we pass a statute of the United States we are to go to the statutes of the States for our construction, except in a case of this kind: We might copy a statute from a State; then the construction given to that statute, previously enacted and which we copied, might have effect upon the decisions of the courts, but that would be because we adopted the statute and made it our statute.

Mr. President, I want to see this law, if it is passed, so written that some rule of conduct, some guide, shall be set up so that the citizen will know when he reads the law what his rights are. I do not want to assist in writing a statute here that I can not construe until I have read the statutes of all the States, particularly when the statutes of each of the States are radically different. That can not be done; at least, it so seems to me.

I confess I have heard so many strange and new doctrines here that I am beginning to think that all I ever believed is perhaps without substance. I sometimes doubt my own judgment when I hear good lawyers and sound men advocate views that seem to me so utterly unsound. I do not know whether the attention of the Senate has been called to the case—I know the Senate is in no humor to deliberate—but I put the citation in, as my attention was called to it by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I refer to the case of Alabama & New Orleans Transportation Co. v. Doyle, Two hundred and tenth Federal Reporter. I read just a clause:

> Of like effect and subject to like infirmity is the provision forbidding the sale of securities if the commission thinks that the company's organization or proposed plan of business is not "fair." Broader and vaguer language could not be chosen. It subjects to the practically uncontrolled discretion of the commission every issue or general sale of stocks, bonds, or securities hereafter to be made in Michigan. For this and the provision regarding probable loss we heard upon the argument and we find in the briefs no claim of justification on grounds of public welfare, and we know of none. They deprive plaintiffs of property, and they do not carry the semblance of "due process of law."

It would take too much time to read the case, but I commend it to the consideration of my associates.

I was asked what my position is. It is my opinion that if we employ the term "unfair competition" as it is employed in this bill, without adding anything to it, the courts will adopt as the meaning of Congress that meaning which has been affixed to the term by all of the law dictionaries and by a great many legal authorities, which I cited and which I do not propose to weary myself to repeat nor to weary the Senate to hear. If, however, the court should take the view that there is not to be given the restricted meaning, then I think we are turned loose in the broad field of conjecture, and that the bill attempts to repose in this board authority to decide a thing to be right if the board feels it is right and to decide it to be wrong if the board feels it is wrong. There is not to be found within the whole of this proposed statute any guide or statement to indicate such a purpose in the legislation as will enable a court to determine the meaning of this term.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. With the permission of the Senator, I should like to address to him another question concerning this matter. Let us assume that this controversy came before a court upon an order made by the commission enjoining a corporation from, we will say, for instance, the operation of a bogus independent concern; or we will say that it is brought before the court upon an order enjoining price cutting, as that term is understood—the selling of goods in a community at even less than the cost for the obvious purpose of driving another competitor out of the trade. The court is then called upon to say whether the language "unfair competition" denounces and makes unlawful that kind of practice. I apprehend that if the Senator were a judge upon the bench he would have no hesitancy in saying that Congress intended to denounce that practice. Whatever meaning may be assigned to the words, they do at least embrace that thing.

Mr. REED. How do they embrace it, and where is the language in the bill that says they embrace it? If the Senator will show me a line in the bill referring to either one of those practices or referring to any principle embracing those practices, I will concede his point; indeed, I might concede the whole case if you put into this bill enough to indicate such a purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if that is done, the Senator might very well concede the whole case; but I do not want to put anything in the bill except what is there. The Senator, we will say, is now a judge sitting upon the bench; such an order as the one to which I have referred has been made by the trade commission; the party against whom it has been made has appealed to the court to vacate and annul that order, and the contention is made that the law is without effect; that the words "unfair competition" have no meaning; that they do not express anything. Would the Senator, as a judge upon the bench, say "That is right; I do not find that acts of this character are denounced by the law; I do not believe it was intended they should fall within the meaning of the words "unfair competition"? In other words, do we not know now, from the use of the words, that they do embrace a large number of practices generally spoken of as "unfair competition"? They may embrace a lot more of which we do not know; there will be a field for speculation; but, within certain defined limits, do we not know that we are now denouncing and rendering unlawful price cutting, the management of bogus corporations, tying contracts, and other devices of that character which are well known to those who have endeavored to fasten monopoly upon the people?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if we now know it, why do we not say it? How is a court to know what we have in mind? How would I know, if I were upon the bench and this question were submitted to me, what Congress had in mind? The trouble with the bill is its utter failure to designate, either by general or specific phrase, the acts the Senator refers to; all is left to conjecture. The Senator from Montana, from his viewpoint—and it is a most exalted and splendid one—will say at once it embraces the practices he names. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] might say that, in his judgment, it did not embrace any of them, and that when he voted for the bill he had in mind an entirely different kind of practice. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], within the all-embracing sweep of his intellect, would undoubtedly gather in thousands of acts which the Senator from Montana would not include in the condemnation of this bill. We then get back to this: You must put some definition in the law, because otherwise everybody will have his own definition, just as everybody now entertains different views. Suppose that we were to adopt the Senator's suggestion, I might vote for this bill, believing and intending it should only stop the character of price-cutting of which he spoke, while my friend in front of me [Mr. SAULSBURY] might vote for it, thinking that it did not affect price-cutting; that that was honest competition.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] might conclude that it embraced the practices referred to, and that it also embraced some others; and accordingly, instead of having a law the meaning of which we could determine by reading the law, we would have to go around and ask everybody what he meant when he voted for the law, and what he intended to embrace in it, and at the end of that time we would have just as many different definitions as there are Senators.

Everybody knows that a law is not construed in that way. When the courts come to construe a law they take into consideration primarily the purpose and intent of the legislative body in passing it. How do they determine that intent? They determine that intent from the law itself. On occasions, where there is ambiguity, they will look at the history of the legislation and of the times for light upon the ambiguity. They have even been known in rare instances to refer to the debates, but that is never done, as I understand, beyond the mere employment of it for the purpose of removing an ambiguity. It is never used to create a meaning.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to address another question to the Senator. The Senator has referred to the different views that might obtain among different Senators, for instance, with respect to the scope of this language. Some of them would give it a very narrow construction, believing that it was intended to denounce only a few practices. Other Senators would give it a wider scope and application, believing that it would include others. Reference was made to the Senator from Nevada, who might give it a still wider scope, and believe that it included many others. But, Mr. President, that is the condition with all laws.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I utterly deny that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH. Contentions, of course, arise again and again—they are arising in the courts every day—as to whether you are to give a narrow construction to a law, confining it in its operation to a few things, or whether you are to give it an expansive construction, including many other things. Why, the Constitution of the United States presents that very situation. For years a controversy has been going on, even from the birth of the Republic, as to whether a narrow construction should be given to the language there used, or whether it should embrace many, many powers. So the fact that different minds would reach different conclusions with respect to the particular practices embraced within it is no reason for denouncing this proposed law.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator must know that he has not at all met the question. Here is a law that lays down no rule; and the Senator says it ought to be adopted, although it lays down no rule and gives no definition, because, says the Senator, after you have made the best rule and given the best definition possible, doubts may still arise. That is the logic of his position.

Why not, then, just get rid of all our difficulties at once? Why not provide forthwith that hereafter the courts shall have the power to prohibit all that is wrong and wipe out these long law books that we have written and just say: "Well, we have had to cavil over statutes; we have not always understood the Constitution. They have been matters of debate; and so, in order to get rid of that difficulty we have just adopted a general law which empowers a commission to do whatever it pleases"?

The difference between the two propositions is this: In one case you lay down no rule of conduct, no guide for a court, no guide for a citizen. In the other case you lay down a rule and a guide, but in the application of that particular rule there are, of course, frequently met grave difficulties. Often the facts lie in the shadow ground so that it is hard to decide whether they come within the rule or without the rule laid down.

The difficulty is generally not in the rule, but in the application of it. This is the first time, however, that I have ever heard the doctrine announced that because it is difficult to apply a specific and definite rule therefore we should wipe out all laws; and this is the first time I have ever heard it seriously argued that you can vest in a board or in a court the powers to do that which it believes it ought to do, without laying down a single rule by which it is to proceed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me while I finish what I am saying, I will yield in a moment.

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Let me illustrate: A man is brought into court. Does the judge decide the case as the judge may conclude he himself would have done? Not at all. The citizen of this Republic coming into court plants himself upon the law, and the judge decides whether or not he has violated that law. If the citizen feels aggrieved, he goes to a higher court, and says: "I come here declaring that I have been deprived of my lawful rights." If you have no rule of law, if you have no Constitution, if you have not prescribed what his rights are by any general rule or any specific rule, and the decision is against him, how, then, can he appeal? He can not appeal because his legal rights have not been invaded, for where there is no law there can be no legal rights, hence there is nothing on which to base his appeal. There is nothing upon which he can stand.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has passed the point about which I wanted to ask his opinion, because his opinion is sound on law, as it is on everything else.

It seems to me the Sherman Act and the words of the Sherman Act, "restraint of trade," are somewhat of an answer to the argument of the Senator, and I should like to hear his view of that matter.

The term "restraint of trade," or, as the court now construes it, "unreasonable restraint of trade," is indefinite and uncertain and vague, and lays down no rule. The Sherman law has been attacked, and it has been charged in the courts and tried out that it is a void statute because of that very thing; that it is so uncertain and so vague that the parties can not understand what the crime is, and consequently the law is void.

The Supreme Court, however, in rather a late case, has taken up that contention and disposed of it very speedily. It held that that general statement and that general use of language, which it seems to me is fully as general and fully as indefinite as the term "unfair competition," does not render the statute void; and yet there is no rule of conduct laid down in that statute, which is not only a civil statute but a criminal statute.

Mr. REED. Was the Senator out when I discussed that matter a moment ago?

Mr. KENYON. I beg the Senator's pardon if he has discussed it. I was not in the Chamber at the time he discussed it.

Mr. REED. I did in a brief way. For the benefit of the Senator, I will say that if he will examine the cases—as he undoubtedly has—if he will review them, he will find out that the first way the court met the objection was by asserting that the term "restraint of trade" did have a definite and fixed meaning in the law years before it was incorporated into the Federal statute.

Mr. KENYON. That was as to the civil action.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Did the Senator discuss the criminal phase of the matter?

Mr. REED. No; but if it had a definite meaning as to the civil action and could be employed in construing the law in the civil action, of course it could be likewise in the criminal action, the point being not the statute in which it was used, but whether or not it had a meaning. I stated, further, that as I read those decisions the court holds that while the term "restraint of trade" at common law was somewhat restricted, nevertheless it condemned, in principle, all of those practices which have now been held to be embraced within the Sherman Act; that the practices had varied, but that the principle had continued, and could be extended to cover those practices.

Another view that I want to suggest, and which I think the Senator will find reflected in the decisions, is this: In the very language of the Sherman Antitrust Act the purpose and intent, the thing with which they were dealing, is made manifest. Congress was dealing with monopolies, the term being a well-defined and known term. It was dealing with "combinations and monopolies" in restraint of trade. The terms were linked together so that one of them threw light upon the other; and no one reading the Sherman Act could doubt that it was intended to stop at least a large number of the practices which have since been condemned.

The general principle is plain upon the surface of the statute. It does not depend for its meaning upon the one term "restraint of trade," but it depends upon the term "restraint of trade" coupled with the term "conspiracy"; and in the other sections of the statute it is provided that—

> Every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce—

And then—

> Every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce—

Is condemned. Out of the context you get an immense amount of light as to the intent and purpose of Congress in passing this legislation.

You can hardly say that, however, for the bill under consideration. If you examine it you find that the first section simply creates the commission. The second section relates to the terms and salaries of the commissioners.

The third section confers the power, in paragraph (a), to investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation, and so forth.

Paragraph (b) requires the corporation to furnish the commission such information as it may demand.

Paragraph (c) provides a uniform system of annual reports.

Paragraph (d) provides for making public these reports under certain conditions.

Paragraph (e) confers upon the Attorney General the power, in any suit in equity brought under the antitrust acts, to refer the matter to the commission to act practically as a master in chancery. That is the first reference at all to the antitrust acts; but, notice, the language restricts their power there. The power of the commission is simply to act in aid of the court, in aid of an existing law, simply as a master in chancery might find the facts, or recommend the form of decree, not under this law, but under the antitrust laws of the United States.

Then it gives the commission power, if its finds from its inquiries and investigations that any concern has violated any of the laws of the United States regulating commerce, to report its findings; but, plainly, that would refer to a violation of the laws now existing, to wit, the Sherman Antitrust Act, and would be restricted to that meaning. I think that is the fair construction.

The commission is then given the power to investigate trade conditions in foreign countries where associations, combinations, or practices of buyers or dealers may injuriously affect our export trade. Plainly, that throws no light upon this phrase. This commission has no extraterritorial jurisdiction. It is, in respect to the last power mentioned, a mere body created to collect information. Thus far the commission is a mere gatherer of information.

Then section 4 says that its jurisdiction shall extend to all trade associations, corporate combinations, and corporations as hereinbefore defined, engaged in or affecting commerce. Now, applying that, we get no further than this: We have given it the power to investigate, and now we have defined the kind of corporations and the kind of associations it can investigate. Still we have no light as to what is fair or unfair competition. Still we have have no light as to this new jurisdiction that is to be conferred—not a word.

Then you come to section 5. There you leap into the midst of a new subject. Here, for the first time, we propose to enact a law which says that "unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful," and then the commission is empowered to prevent it.

In one line, disassociated from every other part of the bill, without a single ray of light reflected upon it by anything that preceded it or follows it, you find this broad and sweeping term: Unfair competition is hereby declared to be unlawful. In these eight words is granted more of power than was ever possessed by king or potentate of this earth. If they mean what my friends say. Yet I venture to assert that if my friend from Montana will go into his room and write down what he thinks he is prohibiting, and my friend from Nevada will go into another room and write down what he thinks he is prohibiting, they will be much farther apart in their definitions than their respective States are geographically.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he is prepared to go into his room and write down what he would like to have prohibited under this section. I ask the question in entire good faith. I am very anxious to have the judgment of the Senator from Missouri, and I trust of many other Senators upon this floor, who are critical of this section, that they will suggest some language which will cover all the unfair practices which they think ought to be covered by this statute.

We have had no difficulty in having a suggestion from different Senators as to the method of court review. We have some four or five amendments pending on that subject, but only two Senators thus far essayed the task of defining what unfair practices specifically should be prohibited; one, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who confined his proposed legislation simply to price discrimination, and the other, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who also confined his definition to price discrimination, although differently phrased.

I assume from the interest that has been taken in the discussion of this question, if it were easy to define comprehensively all that every Senator has in his mind which ought to be included within the term "unfair competition," we by this time would have had numerous amendments to that effect, and I can only assume that those who have thought upon this subject have come to the conclusion that we should either not legislate at all, or if we did legislate we would have to be contented with some general phrase; otherwise if we attempted to define it we would leave out numerous practices that ought to be prohibited, and particularly the Protean forms of unfair competition that are likely continually to arise as one unfair practice after another is condemned by the law and by the court.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator frequently has recourse to the position he has taken. Whenever this provision is hard pressed my good friend the Senator tucks it under his arm and takes refuge in the declaration that we ought to pass the bill as he has drawn it, whether it be sound or unsound, unless we are prepared to write a law that is sound.

It does not follow that because the Senator has brought in something that is bad we must take that or produce something that is perfect. We ought not to be asked to take that which is bad at all. We are under no obligation to accept a thing that is bad, and the fact that there are evil and wicked practices in this world does not at all give the Senator the right to assume that those who are not willing to take his particular variety of physic are in favor of those practices.

For the present I am confining my remarks to pointing out the defects of the Senator's bill. I have not been upon the committee which drew and reported this bill. I have been working upon the Judiciary Committee that had before it an antitrust law, and in that antitrust law we have reached, I think, very thoroughly a number of the very practices and conditions which are disturbing the mind of the Senator. That is my best thought upon the question up to this day, and I gave my earnest effort to the reporting of that bill, and unless some error is pointed out in it I shall give it my earnest support upon the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I may be mistaken, but if my recollection is right, the bill which has been before the Judiciary Committee only reports two forms of unfair practices, one relating to price discrimination and the other relating to "tying" contracts. If that is the fact, or if there are only three or four, I should regard that as hardly covering all the ground that we want to cover by a proposal with reference to unfair practices. It simply strengthens my assumption, knowing the able lawyers upon the committee and the time they have given to this subject, that they find it exceedingly difficult and almost impracticable to define with exactness the protean form to which I have alluded of unfair competition.

I wish to assure the Senator that I have not the slightest criticism to make regarding the attitude he has assumed. I always regard criticism as helpful, and I am sure that I always listen with great interest to any suggestion that is made by the incisive mind of my friend from Missouri. All that I ask is that in addition to the critical faculties the constructive faculties should be utilized, and that we should have the aid of his talent and ability and experience in framing a substitute for the term "unfair competition" that will meet the requirements of the situation. I ask that not in the way of faultfinding at all but simply because I want the help and the cooperation of the Senator from Missouri. I am sure that he is in sympathy with our purpose. I do not believe for a moment that he has any obstructive purpose. I believe his argument to be in entire good faith with reference to the accomplishment of the purposes that the Interstate Commerce Committee have in view, and we will only welcome his cooperation in the work of securing a more general and comprehensive and at the same time a definite and specific phrase that will cover this important subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it has seemed to me, as these criticisms were made, that if they were conceded to be well taken we might properly then start upon the question of writing, or trying to write, a provision that would cover the evils we all want to prohibit. In that event, the natural thing would be for the committee to bring in an amendment. But the committee does not do that. They continue to praise this bill, and they continue to say to everybody who criticizes it, "You ought not to criticize this bill; you ought to go and prepare an amendment;" and yet every moment that one would be out of the Chamber writing the amendment the effort would be going on to force the bill through just as it is.

If my poor services will be of any value, I am perfectly willing to try and aid, but how can you aid a man who insists that he already has an absolutely perfect remedy, that his bill is the perfection of human reason? How are you going to help a man of that kind? Of course, I could not bring any additional knowledge or learning to the committee. I would be guilty of an act of supreme impudence to undertake to act as legal adviser to the committee. I have been trying to get the Senator to concede that this bill needs amendment. When he concedes that, I take it there will either be an amendment offered by somebody else or brought in by the Senator or the section will be withdrawn or defeated.

The Senator says that the antitrust bill which is reported here and over which we worked a long while does not touch everything. That is true. No mind of finite man has ever been able to draw a statute so all embracing that it would prevent all wrong and remedy all evil. Nobody can draw such a statute as that; but if we can reach the principal evils, I think we will have accomplished much.

I rose, as I said to talk two or three minutes, simply to call attention to a remark made by my friend from Illinois. Let me show for a minute what the antitrust bill does: I am referring to the bill that is before the Senate following this one.

It makes it "unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise," and so forth, "for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory," and so forth, to "fix a price charged therefor or discount from or rebate upon such price on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, or supplies" of another.

If I may have the attention of the Senator from Nevada, who thinks there is nothing in the bill, I call his attention to the fact that that one provision reaches a vast field in which those who have engaged in restraint of trade have operated, that it reaches the oppressive means they have employed to shut out of business thousands of people, and that it opens to a very large extent the trade and commerce, so that it shall be without restriction made by contracts that are imposed by those who happen to have the advantage of manufacturing or selling an article. It reaches a vast number of these very practices which are condemned by the Senator.

I call the attention of the Senator to section 5 of the antitrust bill, which gives additional rights to litigants. It provides—

That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

What does that section mean? What will be its effect? It means, for all practical purposes, that every man who is hereafter injured by any concern violating the antitrust statutes can bring suit in the great majority of cases in his own district, and when he brings that suit he can recover triple damages and his attorney's fees. It follows that the Argus eyes of thousands of business men now being injured will be upon the powerful concerns, and the thousand arms of the courts will be employed to prevent their evil practices. We will no longer be left merely to action by the Attorney General.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to put this into the RECORD, and then I will yield. I do not like to break this part of my remarks up into parts.

It is further provided that when the United States has brought a proceeding in equity under the antitrust act, and there has been a decision that there has been a violation of the law, that that decision "shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto."

Thus we have furnished the injured party with a weapon of tremendous power. He no longer is to be obliged out of his own purse to expend thousands of dollars and months of time in running out the ramifications of a conspiracy in restraint of trade, but that question having been once ascertained and judgment rendered he can establish in his suit a prima facie case as to all matters involved in the previous controversy by merely laying down a copy of the judgment. We have been putting some teeth into this law. We have been strengthening the arm of the man who has felt the evil effect of these great concerns.

I want to say that, fully and completely enforced, the present laws in my judgment will remedy many of the evils of which my good friend the Senator from Nevada justly complains.

We have extended the statute of limitations so that either in civil suits or in criminal suits the action may be brought within six years. Thus we have avoided a condition which has enabled many of these institutions to escape, because frequently their evil practices have never been unearthed until the statute of limitations has operated as a bar.

We have provided that no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or shares of capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce when the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially reduce competition.

We have also reached to the holding company. Thus we have struck at the conditions out of which have grown a multitude of the evils to which the Senator has referred, for it has been by virtue of interlocking directorates and by virtue of holding companies that, to a large extent, the power has been accumulated which has enabled the successful practice of the oppressive measures complained of by the Senator, and properly and justly complained of.

We have provided here a section which, I think, will stop some of the most vicious practices ever indulged in and which if it had been upon the books a few years we probably would not have had the scandals and outrages growing out of the transactions of the New Haven Railroad and other deals of like character. I refer to section 9a, which makes every officer of a corporation "engaged in commerce as a common carrier" guilty of theft who "willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, credits, or securities" of the corporation or firm.

We have also extended the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There are, too, other wholesome provisions in the bill. It is not of the limited character that my friend thinks.

So I believe we are traveling in the right direction. I am willing to travel as fast and as far as I can go, always having due regard for the safety of the country, for the maintenance of law, and for the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS rose.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator; indeed, I yield the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Missouri did not think that I was endeavoring in any way to belittle the admirable bill which the Judiciary Committee has presented to this body. All that I claimed was that that committee had given consideration to certain practices which are included in the term "unfair competition"; and so difficult was the task, apparently, of covering the entire ground, that they have covered in the bill which they have presented to this body only two practices which can be catalogued under the head of "unfair competition": One relating to the process of discrimination, the other relating to "tying" contracts. I simply stated that as an indication of the difficulty of attempting specifically to define every practice which comes under the general term "unfair competition" and as a practical illustration of the wisdom of accepting a general phrase which has undergone the process of evolution, the meaning of which is far advanced beyond the meaning attached to it under the common law in medieval times, as indicated by the decision to which the Senator has alluded, which now, in the common vernacular, in economic discussion, and in decrees of the courts, has a wide and general significance, which can be enforced and will be enforced by the courts.

I believe that in these practices are the germs of future monopolies. I believe that the monopolistic organization of the past is at an end—the monopolistic organization created by the gathering together of numerous plants and the amalgamation of numerous corporations with a view to absorbing a large proportion of the business of the country, and by their very gigantic size intimidating business; that the monopolistic devices of the future will be the devices of deceit and of cunning and of fraud. Those devices are as numerous as the imagination of man can suggest. We will simply narrow their field of operation by attempting to define each individual practice.

I wish to disclaim altogether any disposition to criticize the bill presented by the Judiciary Committee. I would not hesitate to criticize it if I thought it deserved criticism; but I have not criticized it; I have not even criticized it as a meager bill. All I can say is that when the Judiciary Committee of the other House has been in session for six months considering the quest on of specifically defining the practices that constitute unfair competition and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has been in session for weeks on this subject, and the output is only two individual cases of unfair practice, it is an evidence of the fruitlessness of an attempt specifically to define each practice that is to come under the control of this commission and of the courts, and that there must be employed some general phrase, as has been the custom of the law from time immemorial, to cover acts which it is the intention of the law to condemn.

I have stated time and time again that I believe all acts in business contra bonos mores, acts which would constitute a basis for an action at law or in equity, whatever they may be and whatever may be their form, involving unfair competition, will come within this phrase. I believe that immense benefit will come from making unlawful unfair competition; that it will protect the pygmies against the giants of business, and that it will do more to open the lines of competition and the paths of commerce than all other legislation that we have upon the statute books upon this subject.

Mr. CLAPP. I submit two proposed amendments to the pending bill and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will be received, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the amendment which has been agreed upon and presented by the committee, proposing an additional section to the pending bill, to be known as section 11, be considered at this time.

Mr. KERN. I withhold my motion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I presume the Senator does not expect to secure a vote on that amendment to-night?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I thought we might have a vote on it.

Mr. SMOOT. We can not get a quorum here to-night. It is half past 5 o'clock now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think there will be objection to it. It is purely a formal amendment, adding a section to the bill, to provide that nothing contained in the bill shall interfere with prosecutions under the antitrust law.

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment can be considered at any time; there will not be any objection to it, I think, when there is a quorum present; but I think it would be very much better if the Senator would let it go over at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the suggestions upon the other side of the Chamber are made in so low a tone that it is impossible for those of us on this side to hear what is going on.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My suggestion was that we should now adopt the additional section that the committee agreed upon, to the effect that the proposed act shall not affect in any way the antitrust act. The Senator from Utah has suggested that it would be necessary to have a vote upon that, and has requested that it go over for the present.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any question about it, and no time will be lost by having it go over to-night. I think it will be impossible to secure a quorum at this time. The Senator from Indiana has already moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask if it will not be possible to fix an hour to-morrow at which we can commence to vote?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator even suggests that, we will have to have the roll called to ascertain the presence of a quorum. I will state that an agreement to that effect would be out of the question now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that debate is very nearly exhausted.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that we can get a vote upon the amendments and upon the bill in a very short time by allowing matters to take their regular course. That is the way I feel about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suppose the pending question is upon the amendment of the committee to the House bill. I do not want, and I am sure no one else wants, to vote upon that question or any other of any great concern to-night. I am quite prepared to go forward with an amendment which I shall offer if the leader on the other side does not desire to suspend at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The amendment to which the Senator refers is the holding-company amendment, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Indiana suggest that we now go into executive session?

Mr. KERN. I was about to make that motion. I withheld it to see if any further progress could be made with the pending measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. To go into executive session would be very agreeable to me; I think it would be the very best thing to do at this time.

PETITION.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (for Mr. WARREN) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bonneville, Wyo., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 6175) granting a pension to Leander Alexander; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (for Mr. WARREN):

A bill (S. 6176) for the relief of the owners of lighter No. 128; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 6177) granting a pension to Harry B. Robb; to the Committee on Pensions.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On July 27, 1914:

S. 5462. An act to authorize the county of Barry, State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the White River in Barry County, Mo., at or near a point known as Goldens Ferry; and

S. 5957. An act to authorize the Frost-Johnson Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the Sabine River, in the States of Louisiana and Texas, about 2 miles west of Hunter, La.

On July 28, 1914:

S. 785. An act to relinquish, release, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to certain lands in the State of Mississippi;

S. 1087. An act authorizing the exchange of certain lands within the Fishlake National Forest, Utah; and

S. 5316. An act authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof.

LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. MYERS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1784) restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and tributaries having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same.

H. L. MYERS,
M. A. SMITH,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SCOTT FERRIS,
JAMES M. GRAHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Wednesday, July 29, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, July 30, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 29, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, incline Thine ear and hear our petition. Open Thou our spiritual eyes, that we may discern beneath the rough exterior in every human being the image of his Maker; that a profounder love, a broader charity may prevail in the hearts of all mankind; that the ties of fraternity may have a broader scope, a deeper significance; that the genius of the Christian religion may find its full fruition in every heart, and Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 12579), which was printed in yesterday's proceedings of the House.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the conference report, and that the statement be read in lieu of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the conference report, and to read the statement in lieu of it. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The report is short. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1031).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 37.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000."

Also, in lieu of the sum proposed in the amendment of the Senate numbered 98 as agreed to in conference, insert "$49,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 139: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Chickasaw and Cherokee tribes of Indians of Oklahoma entitled under existing law to share in the funds of their respective tribes, or to their lawful heirs, out of any moneys belonging to said tribes in the United States Treasury or deposited in any bank or held by any official under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, said payment not to exceed, in the case of the Chickasaws, $100 per capita, and in the case of the Cherokees, not to exceed $15 per capita, and all said payments to be made under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That in cases where such enrolled members, or their heirs, are Indians who by reason of their degree of Indian blood belong to the restricted class, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, withhold such payments and use the same for the benefit of such restricted Indians: Provided further, That the money paid to the enrolled members as provided herein, shall be exempt from any lien for attorneys' fees or other debt contracted prior to the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 155: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert:

"It appearing by the report of the Joint Congressional Commission created under section 23 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913 (Senate Document No. 337, Sixty-third Congress, second session), that the Indians of the Yakima Reservation in the State of Washington, have been unjustly deprived of the portion of the natural flow of the Yakima River to which they are equitably entitled for the purposes of irrigation, having only been allowed 147 cubic feet per second, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to furnish at the northern boundary of said Yakima Indian Reservation in perpetuity enough water, in addition to the 147 cubic feet per second heretofore allotted to said Indians, so that there shall be during the low water irrigation season at least 720 cubic feet per second of water available when needed for irrigation; this quantity being considered as equivalent to and in satisfaction of the rights of the Indians in the low water flow of Yakima River and adequate for the irrigation of 40 acres on each Indian allotment; the apportionment of this water to be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $635,000 to pay for said water to be covered into the reclamation fund; the amount to be appropriated annually in installments upon estimates certified to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. One hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated to pay the first installment of the amount herein authorized to be expended, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to prepare and submit to Congress the most feasible and economical plan for the distribution of said water upon the lands of said Yakima Reservation, in connection with the present system and with a view to reimbursing the Government for any sum it may have expended or may expend for a complete irrigation system for said reservation."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The Senate conferees have receded on amendment No. 37.

On the following amendments the House conferees receded with qualifying or substitute amendments:

No. 81: Decreases from $250,000 to $200,000 the amount appropriated for continuing the construction of the irrigation system on the Flathead Indian Reservation, in Montana. Also corrects an error in Senate amendment No. 98.

No. 139: Provides for a per capita payment of $15 to the enrolled members of the Cherokee Tribe of Indians and a $100 per capita payment for each enrolled Chickasaw Indian in the State of Oklahoma, and exempts such payments from liability for attorneys' fees and other debts contracted prior to the passage of this act. Also provides that the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, withhold such payments from restricted Indians and use the same for their benefit.

No. 155: Provides a certain specified amount of water in perpetuity for irrigation purposes on the Yakima Indian Reservation, authorizes a certain sum for such purpose to be paid in annual installments, and appropriates $100,000 as the first installment.

C. D. CARTER,
CHAS. H. BURKE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the conference report.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. To what particular item does the gentleman refer? There are four or five items.

Mr. MANN. I have reserved a point of orde: to the conference report. I think it is subject to a point of order, but I do not know whether I shall insist upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there any particular item about which the gentleman desires information?

Mr. MANN. I want to ask in reference to two items, one in reference to the Choctaws and the other in reference to the Yakima reclamation plant.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Choctaw matter is amendment 139. The trouble over that amendment arose from the fact that the Mississippi Choctaws were involved. That has been entirely eliminated from the bill. We give the Cherokees $15 per capita and the Chickasaws $100 per capita, and omit the Choctaws, so there is no controversy in either House now as to amendment 139.

Mr. MANN. I was not aware that both Houses had agreed to that item, and as the House has twice rejected it, I would like to know about it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The conferees of the House and Senate have both agreed to this.

Mr. MANN. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Senate adopted the conference report last evening, which is now before the House for final action.

Mr. MANN. It was stated on the floor, during the discussion of amendment 139, that the Choctaw fund in the Treasury and the Chickasaw fund in the Treasury were one—both one fund. Is that true?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is not correct. Originally the land belonged to all the Indians, that is, the two tribes were granted the land together by the United States; but afterwards they were separated, and a dividing line run between the two nations, and now the lands have been separated for 40 or 50 years.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the conference report, the question in reference to the disposition of the Choctaw fund remains in abeyance until further action by Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; without being interfered with in any way by this bill. It remains in statu quo.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to say, with respect to the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois about the fund being a common fund between the Chickasaws and Choctaws, that I inquired of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs whether or not any complications would arise in the event the Chickasaws should receive their per capita payment out of this fund, and the commissioner informed me that it would not cause any complication, that it was merely a matter of bookkeeping and would be charged against the account of the Chickasaw Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, before that item is passed, I want to suggest that whatever may be paid to the Chickasaws will be charged to them and there will still be due them something like $1,500,000 to be paid at some future time after the payment that this authorizes. Consequently, if there should be any money paid out on account of claims that may be paid to Mississippi or other Choctaws the matter can still be adjusted.

I want to call attention to one provision in the amendment that has been incorporated in conference that was not in the Senate amendment, and that is the last proviso, which was put in after we struck out the so-called Williams amendment.

It is as follows:

Provided further, That the money paid to the enrolled members as provided herein shall be exempt from any liens for attorneys' fees or other debts contracted prior to the passage of this act.

I think the House will recognize that that is a wise provision, and that it will insure this money going to the Indians in the first instance, at least, even if it gets away from them very soon after they receive it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. From a statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] just now, I understood that he had been advised by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that it would make no legal difference in the status of the Indians and their property rights if the Chickasaws should at this time receive a payment of $100 per capita and the Choctaws not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the gentleman is correct in that statement.

Mr. MILLER. Was any further attempt made by the conferees to ascertain the legal effect of this action, other than to secure the opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What information we received was from the department, and Mr. Meritt, Assistant Commissioner, was present.

Mr. MILLER. I will say to the gentleman that I have given some thought to the matter, as it has been up for consideration on several occasions, and I am far from being persuaded that the position taken by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is correct, although it is likely that it shades a little that way. The fact is that every Chickasaw and every Choctaw is a joint owner of every blade of grass, every grain of sand, every rock, every bit of asphalt, every pound of coal, and every acre of land possessed by these two great tribes. That is in the law and in the agreement. They own it jointly—together. Now, at various times in distributing the proceeds we have roughly given one-fourth to the Chickasaws and three-fourths to the Choctaws, but that has not been exact justice. I think there is very grave danger in making a payment of $100 per capita to the Chickasaws now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that they have in the Treasury about $265 per capita?

Mr. MILLER. I understand, and I understand that the courts might view that as liquidated assets, subject to be distributed; but this is a guardian administrating the affairs of people who own jointly. Now, have we any expression from the Choctaws that they are willing that this payment be made notwithstanding they are denied any payment? To my mind that is a very serious proposition. We do not want to create a claim running into the millions on the part of the Choctaws against the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was their money, and we are acting under the treaty.

Mr. MILLER. That is true. It is not only the Chickasaws' money but the Choctaws'.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. While it is true that the property is jointly owned by the Choctaws and the Chickasaws—that is, the coal, the asphalt, and the land—in the ratio of 3 to 1, roughly speaking, yet when money is received for land or coal, or anything else, it is placed in the Treasury to the credit of the Choctaws and to the credit of the Chickasaws, as their interest may appear.

Mr. MILLER. As their joint fund.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No; it is not placed in a joint fund. It is placed in separate funds.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I understand it is placed in a joint fund.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that they are carried as separate items on the books.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The money is not deposited in a joint fund, but in separate funds.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL. One-fourth of the proceeds arising from the sale of any property belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws is placed to the credit of the Chickasaws, and three-fourths to the credit of the Choctaws.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I will say that that is very doubtful bookkeeping, and may result in a very good-sized claim against the United States, and I do think it is serious whether we should out and out appropriate this money. It does not matter what kind of bookkeeping we follow, the fact remains that the Choctaws own a part of that fund in about the proportion of 3 to 1.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question? Does the gentleman think that there would be any injustice to the Chickasaws if we authorized a per capita payment of $25 or $50 to the Choctaws? Would that not be charged to the Choctaws, and when a future payment was authorized, would we not take into consideration that they had received a per capita payment of $25 or $50, which the Chickasaws had not received, and we would therefore direct that the Chickasaws be paid an amount to equal what the Choctaws had received?

Mr. MILLER. Unquestionably that is the theory upon which this provision is drawn. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If there is still in the Treasury, after this $100 payment is made to the Chickasaws, a million and a half dollars in round numbers, does not the gentleman think, if there should be any injustice done to the Choctaws, there will be an opportunity of correcting it and equalizing the matter, so that the Chickasaws will bear any share that they ought to pay of claims that may be presented that ought to be paid out of the common fund?

Mr. MILLER. If after paying $100 apiece to the Chickasaws they still have a million and a half dollars, that may be a sufficient guaranty, a gold bond in our possession, upon which we can take a chance; but I think nevertheless it is an extremely dubious procedure, and if it were proposed to pay out all of the amount due the Chickasaws in this way, I think it would be a very critical thing.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that they have an immense amount of coal and oil and asphalt?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And timberlands?

Mr. MILLER. That was worth a whole lot more before certain theories of government that now prevail existed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that it is to avoid that very complication that the gentleman from Minnesota has asserted might arise that prompted me to go to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and ascertain from him his opinion. I talked with three of the attorneys in the office, and they told me, as did the commissioner, that they did not believe that this per capita payment to the Chickasaws would cause any difficulty. I want to say in that connection that while we made a fight in behalf of the Mississippi Choctaws against the distribution of this fund, until the Mississippi Choctaws could be taken care of, I do not believe it is a matter of right and justice to the Chickasaws or any other tribes that their per capita payment of distribution should be tied up pending the settlement of the question.

Mr. MILLER. Let us assume a hypothetical and perhaps extravagant case. Let us assume that 20,000 people should be added to the rolls of the Choctaws and the Chickasaws.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman need not assume that, for that will never happen.

Mr. MILLER. I say that it is an extravagant proposition. There are a good many times that many seeking to get on and have been for a number of years, but assuming that, then what position would the Government be in, having paid this out?

Mr. HARRISON. I think this amount that is paid to the Chickasaws will be charged up against them and in the final distribution it will be merely a matter of bookkeeping, to be charged back against them.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Pursuing further the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], the hypothetical proposition, suppose that a large number of Mississippi Choctaws are placed on the rolls, the gentleman will concede that that immediately changes the ratio between the Choctaws as they now are in numbers and the Chickasaws?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Suppose the Chickasaws have received practically their share at the ratio of three to one. A large number of Choctaws are put upon the roll and the ratio is changed, and we find that the Chickasaws then have received more than their proportion. To whom, then, would the Choctaws come for the residue belonging to them? It seems to me to the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that probably there will be enough left for them. I have looked into that. I am under the impression that there will be enough left of the Chickasaws' part of the fund to take care of them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Minnesota just stated that the land, and so forth, belonged to the Chickasaws and Choctaws jointly. Does the gentleman from Mississippi understand that is jointly by tribes or jointly by individuals?

Mr. HARRISON. I think originally they were jointly by tribes, and I think now they are jointly by tribes, but——

Mr. MILLER. Let me say it is jointly by individuals, each individual.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say I am not thoroughly familiar with that phase of the question, and no doubt the gentleman from Minnesota is correct in that.

Mr. MILLER. It is jointly by individuals.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly patent, if it is jointly by tribes, it does not make a particle of difference to the Choctaw Indians how much per capita distribution is made to the Chickasaws, or vice versa; but if they own this jointly as individuals, and you add a large number of new names to the rolls of the Choctaws, that then the distribution to the Chickasaws may result in a diminution of the fund for distribution to the Choctaws. That is perfectly patent.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that would be true if a large number should be put upon the rolls.

Mr. MANN. How many are seeking to get on the rolls?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think at the outside there are over 2,000 that would be able to prove their claims.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's opinion about that is very good; but how many are seeking to get on the rolls?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know; there is quite a number seeking; a great many are seeking to get on the rolls without any warrant to do so.

Mr. MANN. I understood that a gentleman said a moment ago in the House that there were 100,000 seeking to get on the rolls.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is grossly exaggerated.

Mr. MANN. In the opinion of some gentlemen there was no chance for the Mississippi Choctaws to get on the rolls, and it appears there might be now. How about the others seeking? Somebody must think they have a chance or they would not be seeking.

Mr. HARRISON. My opinion is there will be probably 2,000 that ought to be placed on the rolls, if the gentleman asks my opinion about it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman gives his well-considered opinion, but he would not say he has made an investigation to know whether——

Mr. HARRISON. There are about 1,100 who have been identified by the Dawes Commission and who certainly ought to be on the rolls.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says 1,100 in his locality.

Mr. HARRISON. In Mississippi.

Mr. MANN. How many does the gentleman know there are throughout the United States? It is a fact, is it not, that the Government is taking a chance on this, because if the distribution in the end is to be a per capita between the two tribes and not per capita for each tribe considered separately, if they paid too much to the Indians of one tribe, they in the end will be asked to make that up?

Mr. HARRISON. I think so, and I think the opinion of the department was based on that fact—that is, that they thought there would probably be no more placed upon the rolls than could be taken care of.

Mr. MILLER. May I inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether any showing has been made before the conferees indicating the urgency requiring this per capita payment to the Chickasaws at this time? Was there any failure of crops or any famine or anything of that kind?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There was a representation made by the department that it is right that this money should be paid to these Indians. Not only that, but we are under treaty obligations to pay this money to these Indians. It is argued it is a very great injustice to these Indians to have this money in the United States Treasury that should have been paid them years ago, and that it should not be withheld from them now. As I stated before, there is $265 coming to each one of these Indians, and we only propose a payment of $100, which leaves $165 per capita still due. And not only that, but the land, timber, oil, and asphaltum, which is estimated all the way from ten to fifty or sixty million dollars, belong to these Indians, and there can certainly be no chance in any way by which the United States could be mulcted in damages for paying out this $100. I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would not consume the time of the House but for the fact I do not want the House during this debate to get in an avenue of a misapprehension of the facts. Sixteen years ago the Federal Government promised by two treaties—not one, but two—to distribute these funds that belong to these Indians among them and finally settle their affairs. Sixteen long years have these Indians waited for that to be done and have been refused. What do these five tribes ask? Aid from the Government? Not at all; but are asking Congress to give them their own money which belongs to them. It is their money. No one here or elsewhere asserts or dares to assert that it is not their money. They need their money now, not after they are all dead. Statehood has come; white people have come in and have purchased the surplus lands, and the Indians are forced to smaller reservation or allotments. They need this money, and it ought to be paid to them—at least to the competent ones, and to the incompetent ones it ought to be capitalized and used for their benefit by the department. This would shield them from graft or sharp dealing. The present Indian Commissioner is on the job, and he will secure justice in the handling of the funds. Practically all the Five Civilized Tribes are intelligent people who know what they are about, and it is a farce and a farcical performance to longer try to administer their affairs 2,000 miles away. I am not here criticizing the conferees. Now the question arises—and I want to say that the holding up of these moneys, and particularly the Choctaw money, at this time is in direct violation of the treaty stipulations between the United States and the Choctaw Indians, and that instead of the payment of it being made a claim arising by reason of the payment of their money, we had better fear a claim for the injury and damage that may result to the Indians by reason of Congress breaking a direct treaty stipulation in not paying it to them at all. This matter is getting tedious to the Indians, who thought this Government would do what it promised to do with a people wholly within its charge.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and his colleagues no doubt feel that they have some kind of an imaginary claim against these funds. But it has been adjudicated five or six times. I do not want to go into that argument, but this identical fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830 has been adjudicated in every forum that ever had authority to sit on it, and they have always rendered a verdict adverse to them. But 16 years have elapsed without doing what the Federal Government agreed to do, to wit, to settle with the Five Tribes, and I presume they will have to hold on a little longer without the Federal Government doing what they ought to do. They ought to give these Indians, who are practically white Indians, their money and let them alone, and cut them loose from the Federal Government and have nothing more to do with their affairs. They are full citizens, all voters, most of them competent. But I have neither the ability, influence, nor power to now make this House understand the situation sufficiently to do that. The conferees have probably done the best they could. The Mississippi Choctaw claim is not easily understood, and it would not be fair to force Congress to act hastily. When the matter is once understood I have no fears of the result. There can be but one verdict and that will be that the Oklahoma Indians are entitled to their peace.

Now, one word further. The Choctaws and Chickasaws have always maintained separate tribal governments, and they do to-day. They have their separate principal chiefs. Douglas H. Johnson is the governor, or principal chief, of the Chickasaws, and they have a Chickasaw legislature regularly elected and still holding office. The principal chief, or the governor, of the Choctaws is Victor H. Locke, and they have a Choctaw legislature. True, their property since 1837 has been held in common since the Chickasaws bought into the Choctaw Tribe. The Choctaws acquired their title in 1820 and 1830. The Chickasaws bought their interest in that estate in 1837. The Indian Office has kept the two funds separate. They put one-fourth to the credit of the Chickasaws and three-fourths to the Choctaws, due to the fact that the ratio of population was about one-fourth Chickasaws and three-fourth Choctaws of the aggregate population.

As was suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] the Indian Office says there will be no difficulty in this payment to the Chickasaws. Personally I think they all ought to have been paid. I have no doubt the conferees think so. At this late period of the session we have not the time to properly debate this matter and thrash it out, and after conferring with some of the leaders of the House on both sides of the Chamber this course was agreed upon, with very much sorrow and reluctance on my part. I do not think the people ought to be longer held up by the claim which to my mind is totally spurious and without merit. And to my mind as long as there is a dollar left or as long as there is a pound of meat on the Indians' bones, there will be a lot of vultures trying to get on the roll, trying to rob the Indians under one guise or another. As long as it is worth from $3,000 to $5,000 to get on the roll, that long every dirty-faced hybrid will try to do so whether he is with or without Indian blood.

It is my earnest hope, and I am sure it is the hope of every Indian of my State, that this Mississippi Choctaw claim may soon be understood and disposed of, so that this Government can keep faith with the Choctaws and give them their money.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] in reference to amendment No. 155—the Yakima irrigation project. I notice that the Senate amendment originally proposed an appropriation of $100,000 for one purpose in connection with that, and then another $100,000 for another purpose, making $200,000, while the conferees' report makes an authorization, to be paid from the Government Treasury, of $635,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. To be paid in annual payments hereafter by Congress. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. What is the theory of that? Why are we called upon to do that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That follows the report and suggestions made by the joint committee on the part of the two Houses to investigate this special matter during the first session of this Congress, and this follows the report. It makes it definite that the Indians are entitled to one-half of the natural flow of the river. They had only received 147 cubic feet per second, which was entirely too small an amount, and we design by this legislation to do justice to the Indians by giving them the amount of water that that commission has found should have been given to them. And, in addition to that, I will state that the reclamation engineers, headed by Mr. Newell, and the Indian engineers have arrived to these figures that we have adopted here. It is satisfactory to the House and satisfactory to the Senate and satisfactory to the Reclamation Service and the Indian Reclamation Service, and they have all agreed to this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Usually all of these people will agree to any proposition that takes money out of the Federal Treasury instead of their funds. As I understand, here is the Reclamation Service that has a reclamation fund, and the Indian Service has various Indian funds, and they both agree that the money shall be paid out of the Federal Treasury and not out of their funds. I think we ought to have more information on the subject than the gentleman has given us so far as to why we should stand the gaff.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that this commission spent more than 10 days upon this reservation and took a volume of testimony and made the following report to Congress:

[Senate Document No. 337; Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

IMPOUNDING WATERS AND INDIAN TUBERCULOSIS SANITARIUM.

Report presented by Mr. ROBINSON, of the joint congressional commission created under section 23 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913, "For the purpose of investigating the necessity and feasibility of establishing, equipping, and maintaining a tuberculosis sanitarium in New Mexico for the treatment of tuberculous Indians, and to also investigate the necessity and feasibility of procuring impounded waters for the Yakima Indian Reservation or the construction of an irrigation system upon said reservation to impound the waters of the Yakima River, Wash., for the reclamation of the lands on said reservation, and for the use and benefit of the Indians on said reservation."

THE NECESSITY AND FEASIBILITY OF PROCURING IMPOUNDED WATERS FOR THE YAKIMA INDIAN RESERVATION OR THE CONSTRUCTION OF AN IRRIGATION SYSTEM UPON SAID RESERVATION, TO IMPOUND THE WATERS OF THE YAKIMA RIVER, WASH., FOR THE USE AND BENEFIT OF THE INDIANS OF SAID RESERVATION.

The second part of the task assigned this joint commission of Congress relates to a subject quite distinct and disconnected from any question of health or sanitation. It involves many disputed facts, complicated questions of law, and policies of far-reaching importance.

* * * * * * *

A brief historical statement of the subject will be of value and importance.

TREATY OF 1855 WITH YAKIMA AND ASSOCIATED INDIAN TRIBES.

In 1855 the United States made a treaty, ratified in 1859, with the Yakima and Associated Indian Tribes, in the State of Washington, by the terms whereof said Indians ceded a large area of lands to the United States, reserving to themselves what is known as the Yakima Indian Reservation, the same being definitely described.

Said reservation comprises about 1,092,819 acres, of which approximately 120,000 acres in the basin of the Yakima River are irrigable.

The exclusive right of taking fish in all the streams running through or bordering the reservation was expressly reserved by the treaty to the Indians.

At the time of this treaty irrigation was little known, and it does not appear that the subject of water rights bore any important relation to the treaty. It is certain that the value of water rights was not foreseen either by the Indians or the Government.

The controlling purpose of the treaty, however, was to make possible the permanent settlement of the Yakima Indians and their transformation into an agricultural people.

"The treaty was not a grant of rights to the Indians, but a grant of rights from them—a reservation of rights not granted." (U. S. v. Winans, 198 U. S., 381.)

Only a small area of the lands reserved by the Indians was susceptible of profitable cultivation without irrigation.

In the course of time much of the land on the Yakima Indian Reservation was found to be subject to irrigation. Some of these lands having been patented passed into the ownership of white men.

Above the Yakima Indian Reservation, on the Yakima River and the Ahtanum Creek, white men settled and diverted water for irrigation purposes. On the opposite side of the Yakima River from the said reservation is located the Sunnyside irrigation project, embracing 102,000 acres, irrigated from the Yakima River and now having under cultivation about 75,000 acres. This project began under the auspices of a corporation known as the Washington Irrigation Co., but was taken over by the Reclamation Service about 1906. The Reclamation Service has in contemplation three large units in addition to the Sunnyside, namely, the Kittitas, with an approximate area of 82,000 acres, the Benton, with an area of 90,000 acres, and the Tieton, embracing probably 35,000 acres. The latter project is located on the same side of the Yakima River as the Yakima Indian Reservation, while the Sunnyside, Benton, and Kittitas units are on the opposite side of said river. All of these units are embraced in the so-called Yakima Basin.

It is conceded that the natural flow of the Yakima River and its tributaries is not sufficient at low-water stages to irrigate all of the irrigable land within said basin. The shortage of water has led to a controversy extending over many years and causing the appointment of this commission to inquire into the facts and recommend an adjustment of the dispute.

While the history of irrigation on the Yakima Indian Reservation is involved in the obscurity unavoidably incident to the beginning and progress of such affairs, it appears reasonably certain that irrigation by the Indians on the reservation began about 1859. In 1865 approximately 1,200 acres on the reservation were under irrigation. About the time the United States took over the Sunnyside project irrigation work was commenced on the reservation by the Indian Service. This was in May, 1896. It was estimated by William Redman, engineer, in a report June 30, 1897, that by constructing more lateral ditches, 50,000 acres could be irrigated from the system then in existence.

In the meantime white settlers on the other side of the Yakima River from the reservation had made appropriation of water from the river under the laws of the State of Washington.

February 19, 1903, the then superintendent of the Yakima Reservation filed on 1,000 cubic feet per second of water for the use and benefit of said reservation. This was more than the entire low water of the river at a given point in the river adjacent to the reservation. Water users having appropriated almost the entire low-water flow of the Yakima River adversely to the reservation instituted in the State courts injunction suits against the water users on the reservation. While these suits were pending the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hitchcock, undertook to compromise all disputed claims to water rights from the Yakima River. He awarded only 147 second-feet to the reservation and 650 second-feet to the adverse claimants. This allowance of only 147 second-feet was inadequate to meet the actual demands for water on the reservation at the time and totally failed to make provision for future needs. Great dissatisfaction resulted. It is not deemed practicable or profitable here to set forth in detail the history of this important controversy. It continued and gathered volume until development was embarrassed throughout the Yakima Basin.

Your commission visited the State of Washington, inspected the several units in the Yakima Basin, and especially the Wapato and Sunnyside units. Public notice was given that all parties interested in the subject matter would be heard. Hearings were had at the city of North Yakima and at Toppenish. Many witneseses and attorneys representing the various interests involved appeared before the commission and submitted their views in detail.

A part of this testimony has already been printed, and the remainder is herewith submitted.

After a careful consideration of the whole subject and the entire record, the following findings of fact and recommendations are submitted for such consideration and action as the Congresses may deem necessary and advisable.

1. That the allowance by the former Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hitchcock, of 147 second-feet of water of the low-water flow of the Yakima River for the use and benefit of the irrigable lands on the Yakima Indian Reservation was when made and now is inadequate, inequitable, and unfair to said Indian reservation.

2. From a consideration of the whole subject we believe that vested rights have accrued to water users other than those on said reservation and that the low-water flow of the Yakima River is insufficient to supply their needs and the requirements of said reservation. We therefore believe that the United States should provide, for the use and benefit of the irrigable portion of said reservation, free from storage cost and storage maintenance cost, sufficient water to equal the amount to which said reservation was equitably entitled when the finding of Secretary Hitchcock was made.

While it is difficult to determine what this amount should be, we are convinced that it should not be less than one-half of the natural flow of the Yakima River and should be sufficient to irrigate one-half of each allotment of irrigable land on said reservation. That this will cost approximately $500,000, and we recommend that an appropriation of said amount for this purpose be authorized, payable in five annual installments, as the needs of irrigation on said reservation may demand, and on estimates to be submitted, said $500,000 being the amount we believe necessary to purchase such free water in addition to the amount now available for the irrigable land on said reservation from the Reclamation Service as will be required for this purpose.

3. As to the portion of the irrigable allotments in excess of the area to be furnished water free, the allottees may be permitted, but should not be required, to sell the same or any portion thereof, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. The cost of furnishing water for such area not to be furnished water free shall be apportioned equitably according to benefits.

4. As to all allottees on the said Yakima Indian Reservation, the equitable proportionate cost, both as to storage water in addition to such amount as shall be furnished free and as to the cost of maintenance and distribution of all water furnished for said irrigable lands on said reservation, shall be charged to the allottees, respectively, and payable from their proportionate individual shares of tribal funds when distributed.

5. In the event any allottee shall receive a patent in fee to an allotment of irrigable land before the amount so charged against him has been repaid to the United States, then such amount remaining unpaid shall become a first lien on his allotment, and the fact of such lien and the amount thereof shall be recited on the face of each patent in fee issued.

As to all grantees of allottees to whom patents have been issued, the cost which would be charged against the proportionate individual shares of allottees if the lands were not patented shall be fixed as a lien upon the lands so patented.

The repair and extension of the irrigation distribution system for the Yakima Indian Reservation and the maintenance of the same should be under the control of the Indian Service.

The expenses incurred by this commission are approximately $2,500. The exact amount can not at this time be stated, for the reason that a part of the bills for stenographic service have not yet been ascertained and audited.

Respectfully submitted.

DECEMBER 20, 1913.

Mr. MANN. I do not care if they spent 10 months on the reservation. I read the report of the commission hastily without understanding it, and without pretending to understand it. But that is no reflection on the report. I read it when it came in. However, that is not sufficient. Why do we pay these expenses for this irrigation project out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. For the reason that those Indians were in that country long before the country was ever settled, possibly for hundreds of years. They were entitled to one-half of the flow of this river. The whites had deprived them of one-half of the flow, and we thought it proper to give each Indian's 40-acre allotment, that had heretofore been made to him, water free in perpetuity. In order to do that and guard the safety of the Indians in the future we have agreed to give them this as a first installment for the purpose of building ditches and taking the water out of the river. It is of no benefit unless it is taken out of the river and put on the Indian lands, and it will require that much money to furnish the water to 40 acres for each Indian.

Mr. MANN. Let me see if I understand the situation. Here was your Indian reservation and the river, and the Indians were entitled to the use of the water for the purpose of irrigating their land; the Reclamation Service seizes the water for another purpose and uses it, or proposes to use it, for another reclamation project, or something of that sort; now we authorize irrigation works for the benefit of the Indians and advance the money, to be reimbursable out of the proceeds of the sale of their lands. Then we go along in this proposition and provide that they shall have more water than they are now using, and that they shall get that from the Reclamation Service. Then we say we will pay into the Reclamation Service, which I will not say has stolen the water, but has taken it for their purposes, and instead of charging the cost either to the Indians who got their lands irrigated, or to the whites who got their lands irrigated, we charge the cost to the Federal Treasury, and nobody is really to imburse it. Is that correct?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], who was a member of that commission and who has the figures before him as well as the report made by our committee.

Mr. MANN. Was not the gentleman from Texas a member of that commission?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was; but the gentleman from South Dakota has the papers before him, and he can give you the exact figures.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I think some explanation ought to be made of it before the House adopts the amendment in the form it has been agreed to in conference. I am going to try, Mr. Speaker, to make a very brief and comprehensive statement of the matter, and then I shall be glad to answer any questions that may be propounded.

Mr. Speaker, an Indian reservation was set aside many years ago in the State of Washington for the occupancy and use of the Yakima Indians. In consideration therefor the Indians ceded to the United States a large area. This was by treaty made with the United States in 1855 and ratified in 1859. In the treaty between the United States and the Indians it was declared that the purpose of the treaty was to encourage agriculture among the Indians.

As the country developed, white persons moved in and began appropriating water from the Yakima River, which bounds the Yakima Reservation, for irrigation purposes. One project, known as the Sunnyside project, is on the opposite side of the Yakima River from the Indian reservation, and a few years ago it was taken over by the Reclamation Service, and a complete system of irrigation was installed, and the project has since been operated under the Reclamation Service. Congress authorized the construction of an irrigation system for the benefit of the Yakima Indians upon the irrigable area of the Yakima Reservation, comprising 120,000 acres of land, all of which was allotted to individual Indians. This reclamation project was directed to be paid for from the proceeds received from the sale of surplus lands. It was wholly an Indian project and for the benefit only of the Indians. It developed that on account of prior appropriations there would not be sufficient water in the Yakima River to furnish in the low-water season a quantity necessary to irrigate the Indian lands. A conflict arose between the water users and other irrigation projects that became very bitter, and there was such a controversy that the matter was taken into the courts. The Prosser Falls Land & Power Co. and the Washington Irrigation Co. brought suits against the officials of the Yakima Indian Reservation and canals higher up on the river for alleged illegal division of water from the river At the request of the Reclamation Service action under these suits was suspended. Agreements were entered into by these litigants to dismiss the suits in case an agreement could be reached adjusting the questions involved. This resulted in negotiations between all the parties in interest, the Secretary of the Interior acting for and representing the Indians, and at the same time being the head of the department of which the Reclamation Service is a part. The whole question of the rights of the several parties was considered and adjudicated, and an apportionment was made on March 26, 1905, by which 650 second cubic feet was apportioned to the Sunnyside project, while only 147 second feet of the low-water flow of said river was apportioned to the Yakima Indian Reservation. This was inadequate to meet the actual demands for water on the reservation, at least it was not adequate for future needs, and much dissatisfaction resulted.

In order that you may understand the proposition so far as the project of the Sunnyside is concerned, I will say that it is immediately opposite the Yakima project, being upon the public domain, or what was the public domain before it was acquired by the settlers who are now there. There is about the same amount of land that is irrigable in the Sunnyside project as there is in the Indian project on the reservation. The apportionment of water as between the two projects was adjudicated by the Secretary of Interior by apportioning 650 second cubic feet to the Sunnyside and only 147 second cubic feet to the Indians; and that was based, as I understand, upon the question of prior appropriation, prior use, and because of prior use the Sunnyside project was entitled to 650 second cubic feet.

A few years ago an amendment was incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill in the Senate, authorizing an appropriation of $1,800,000 for the purpose of constructing a storage reservoir at the headwaters of the Yakima River for the purpose of supplying water sufficient for the needs upon the reservation to irrigate the irrigable area. The provision was eliminated in conference, and on subsequent occasions, when the same amendment was incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill it met a like fate. In the Indian appropriation act approved August 24, 1912, this matter having then been several times presented by the Senate in conference, a provision was adopted that became the law, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the conditions on the Yakima Indian Reservation with a view of determining the best, most practicable, and most feasible plan for providing the water for said reservation, and in response to that provision a very elaborate and comprehensive report was submitted to Congress on January 23, 1913, it being House Document No. 1299, Sixty-second Congress, third session. A recommendation was made for a storage system costing $1,800,000, and following the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior a provision was again incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill providing an appropriation of $1,800,000 for the construction of the storage system proposed. In conference the provision was eliminated, and in its place a provision was agreed to which became section 23 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913, by which a commission was created, consisting of two members of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs and two Members of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of investigating the necessity and feasibility of procuring impounded water for the Yakima Indian Reservation, or the construction of an irrigation system upon said reservation, and so forth. The commission was appointed, visited the reservation, and made a report to Congress on December 20, 1913, being House Document No. 337, Sixty-third Congress, second session. This commission reported that the allowance by the Secretary of the Interior of 147 second feet of water of the low water flow of the Yakima River for the use and benefit of the Yakima Indian Reservation was when made, and now is, inadequate, inequitable, and unfair to said Indian reservation.

The commission also found that vested rights have accrued to water users other than those on said reservation and that the low-water flow of the Yakima River is insufficient to supply their needs and the requirements of said reservation, and that the United States should provide for the use and benefit of the irrigable portion of said reservation, free from storage cost and storage maintenance cost, sufficient water to equal the amount to which said Indian reservation was equitably entitled when the finding of the Secretary of the Interior was made. The commission stated that it was difficult to determine just what portion of the river the Indians were entitled to, but said that it ought to be sufficient to irrigate one-half of the irrigable area upon said reservation, and a finding was made that it would cost approximately $500,000 to purchase such free water in addition to the 147 second cubic feet already available from the Reclamation Service. This amount was arrived at from figures given by the Director of the Reclamation Service. Since the report of the commission was made the Director of the Reclamation Service stated that he was in error when he stated before the commission what it would cost to furnish such water, and there is no doubt but what he was mistaken, and that $500,000 would not be a sufficient amount to furnish the required quantity of water, and in order that it might be finally determined and to preclude a claim being made to a future Congress that the amount authorized to be appropriated was inadequate, we have authorized by the amendment agreed to in conference that there may be appropriated $635,000, which is the amount that the Director of the Reclamation Service says will be required to furnish the necessary quantity of water.

The amendment appropriates $100,000 of the amount, and provides that future appropriations shall be based upon estimates to be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury as estimates are usually furnished for public works.

One of the purposes in putting this matter in the form in which we have is to keep it separate from the question of a reclamation project to provide storage and a distributing plant for the whole 120,000 acres, as contemplated by the Senate amendment, that would cost between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000, if it did not cost more than the department has estimated. The figures are something over $5,000,000; and, judging by the estimates that have been submitted in the past in connection with the construction of reclamation projects, I think it is quite safe to say that this might cost $6,000,000, or even more.

The Senate amendment contemplated making this a reclamation project the same as if the land were public domain and subject to homestead entry, or land in private ownership, and it contemplated making the Indian allotments bear the reclamation cost, except I may say it was not intended to make the land pay for the storage of water that it is claimed the Indians were deprived of and that they are entitled to.

It proposed creating a lien upon the Indian allotments for the reclamation cost, and the Senate amendment also provided that this lien should be foreclosed as a mortgage lien. Our theory is that it is not within the power of Congress to create a lien upon land which, by a declaration of law or by a treaty, possibly, is exempt from any lien for a period of 25 years, and it was the opinion of the commission unanimously that whatever was done the United States ought to pay whatever it is going to cost, because of the wrong that was done to these Indians in their having been deprived of the water that they were justly entitled to from the Yakima River, and appropriate it and pay it over to the Reclamation Service, so that when they get ready to go ahead with the reclamation project to irrigate the balance of the land, which will be the other one-half of the area, this amount will be credited to the fund, and the balance of the land will bear the expense of the construction and the distribution, and also the additional water that will be required.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. Up to the time the gentleman got to talking about $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 the gentleman's statement was remarkably clear; but I wish to understand whether the gentleman means that it will cost $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 to complete this storage project, or whether the $635,000 is all that it will cost?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that the estimate of the cost for a storage system necessary to provide for water sufficient to irrigate this 120,000 acres would be $1,800,000. There is 120,000 acres of land, and it will cost $24 an acre for distributing the water upon the land in addition to the storage charge. This proposition does not contemplate either the construction of a storage reservoir or the construction of a distributing system. It is simply taking out of the Treasury of the United States a sum of money and paying it to the Reclamation Service to deliver to these Indians along the river the water that they have been unjustly deprived of; and the reason why there is no other recourse except to the Government is that there are other settlers all up and down that river that have now vested rights, and we can not say to them that they must come in and pay additional cost over what they have contracted to pay, which is all that ought to be expected of them. We could not enforce it if we tried to impose upon them the additional cost. The United States being at fault in not protecting the rights of the Indians in the matter of their water rights in that river, the United States has got to pay the bill.

What I was desirous of accomplishing—and I think that was what the commission desired—was to keep this matter separate from the question of a reclamation project, including the 120,000 acres, and provide for paying the amount require to put in the river the water the Indians had been deprived of and let some future Congress, acting through the committees that we have in both branches of Congress that have jurisdiction in relation to the irrigation of arid lands, work out some system by which all the lands may be irrigated.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman suggested that by expending $635,000 you will place the water in the river. How will the Indians use the water after you place it in the river?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that under the law opening the surplus lands of the Yakima Indian Reservation it is provided that there shall be constructed an irrigation plant, to be paid for by the Government and reimbursable from the proceeds from the sale of the lands of the Indians, and there has been constructed upon the Yakima Reservation what is to my notion one of the cheapest and most practicable reclamation projects, perhaps temporary in character, that we have anywhere in the country. We have a project there constructed under the Indian Bureau that has cost only about $250,000. There is a dam and there is a main canal and there are laterals, and about 32,000 acres of the Indian lands are irrigated at the present time. The Reclamation Service say that with sufficient water and at a slight expense the area that could be irrigable from the project now already constructed would probably be in the neighborhood of 80,000 acres, but the difficulty is that in July and August—and that was what the commission encountered when they were upon the reservation—the Indians can not get sufficient water for the lands that they now have under cultivation, because it has already been appropriated and taken from the river. The project is already there, sufficient for the present, I think, to irrigate one-half the irrigable area. What the Reclamation Service contemplates is just wiping off the slate this project that has been constructed by the Indian Service, and that, we think, is working fairly satisfactorily as an Indian proposition, discarding it as being of no account and starting anew and constructing an irrigation project, such as they do construct, that will cost from their own estimates not less than $5,100,000. We do not care to go into that.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will bear with me just a moment, it seems to me the proposition contains two points. You propose to purchase water for the Indian reservation. Now, if you have a system with which you can distribute that water, I understand how you can put it to a beneficial use, but perhaps the Members of the House who are not from western States do not understand that the title to this water rests absolutely upon its beneficial use and that if you were to turn into the stream at this point a thousand cubic feet per second for the use of the Indians and the Indians did not have the distributing system to take care of the water after it was placed at their disposal any settler could seize that water and put it to a beneficial use, and it would at once become his property. So it is very essential, if we purchase this water for the Indians, that the Indians shall have a distributing system to take up the water immediately and put it on the land and be prepared to defend title to that water because they are putting it to a beneficial use, and that is the point I want the gentleman to make clear. If the Indians have not a distributing system, if they are not prepared to use the water and put it to a beneficial use, every western Member of the House knows that the Indians can not retain title to that water.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman will understand the statement which I am about to make. The Reclamation Service now have a storage system. That is, they have the water in storage at the present time that they can furnish for this project. It amounts to this, that we propose to purchase from the Reclamation Service the amount of water that is necessary to supply one-half of the irrigable portion of the reservation. Of course, in the face of this legislation, the Reclamation Service will not attempt to make any other disposition of it, and we will appropriate this $635,000 in such amounts annually as may seem necessary to pay for the water that is being used.

Mr. KEATING. And when the water is delivered by the Reclamation Service, it is the purpose of the Government to have a distributing system prepared, is it?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I may say to the gentleman that there is a distributing system there now, sufficient to irrigate one-half of the irrigable area of this project, if it is properly cleaned out, as the Secretary's report says, and with some slight extensions that would cost only a very small amount.

Mr. KEATING. One more point, if the gentleman will bear with me. That is as to the question of the liability of the Government. The gentleman says that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior which divided the water between the white farmers and the Indians was an unfair decision. Now, on what does the gentleman base that proposition? Before the gentleman answers that, if he will pardon me just a moment, did the Indians make any filings on the water at any time?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that in 1903 the agent for these Indians did make a filing for 1,000 second cubic feet. I think that is not disputed. I want to say to the gentleman—and I think I am in accord with his view of the law—that if you are going into a discussion of the right of the Indians to any portion of the Yakima River as against prior appropriators, we will get into a discussion here that will be long and complicated.

Mr. KEATING. I have no desire to do that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is undoubtedly familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Winters case.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there are two or three gentlemen on this side who want to be heard.

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has four minutes left.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The understanding was that this matter was to take only two or three minutes. We did not agree to yield Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Who had the understanding that it would take only two or three minutes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs gave me that understanding.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I did not suppose there would be any difficulty in putting this through.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We want to go on with the other bill. We do not want Calendar Wednesday taken up.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know where the gentleman got the idea that an Indian conference report could be disposed of in two or three minutes. It never has been done.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That was the impression the gentleman gave me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume time, but this is an important matter; and it is important that the conference report be disposed of, because the appropriation bill ought to become a law by August 1.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But this is a privileged matter. It can be called up at any time, but we can not get any time except on Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the trouble is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] got unanimous consent after the Chair warned the House that this was Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. We are in now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask unanimous consent that to-morrow be considered as Calendar Wednesday, or else get the rest of to-day for the consideration of the regular order. This is a privileged matter, and we do not want to yield Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MADDEN. You have already yielded.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much time does the gentleman want on that side?

Mr. MANN. I want 15 minutes and the gentleman from Washington wants 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Wyoming wants 15 minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate close on this report in 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Who is to have the time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield the time to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I have indicated a desire on this side for 35 minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will extend it 35 minutes. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time be extended to 35 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that the time be extended 35 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, I do not intend to object. I have no desire to discuss the matter further. Of course I am for the amendment, and I thought that some gentleman might want to use the time in opposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask that all debate close in 35 minutes, and at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that his time be extended 35 minutes, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. MANN. While I have reserved a point of order, I will not insist or object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17041. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 4988. An act to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.; and

H. R. 17824. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD (H. DOC. NO. 1134).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the reserve bank organization committee, which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The letter is as follows:

RESERVE BANK ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., June 24, 1914.

To the SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: The reserve bank organization committee has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated April 15, 1914, which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board be, and it is hereby, directed to send to the House of Representatives the ballots, or a tabulated statement thereof, cast by the various national banks of the United States to determine their choice for reserve cities according to a request made to said banks by the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board."

In compliance therewith there is herewith transmitted the information called for.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO,
D. F. HOUSTON,
JNO. SKELTON WILLIAMS,
Reserve Bank Organization Committee.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to ask the gentleman from South Dakota a question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The time is limited, and I do not care to discuss it further.

Mr. MONDELL. I must have 15 minutes if I am going to discuss the matter at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the conference report provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to deliver in perpetuity at the northern boundary of the Yakima Indian Reservation 720 cubic feet of water per second, and an authorization is made of $600,000 in pursuance of that provision. Of course gentlemen must understand that it is immaterial if that provision becomes a law whether we authorize $6 or $6,000,000 the Treasury must pay for the delivery of that much water, no matter how much it may cost to deliver it.

Aside from the question as to the wisdom of guaranteeing this flow of water, there is the objection to be made against the manner in which it is done—contrary to all previous rules or provisions or laws, as far as I recall them, relative to irrigation. If it is wise and it is the duty of the Government to pay enough to insure the delivery of the amount of water stated, what ought to be done is to make an arrangement under the law we have on the statute book known as the Warren Act, which provides for the purchase of water in perpetuity from the Reclamation Service. That is in harmony with general reclamation laws and regulations. This, it seems to me, with all due deference to gentlemen who have suggested it, is a very extraordinary provision, to bind the Secretary of the Interior in perpetuity to protect certain Indians in the delivery of a certain amount of water at a given point, no matter what may happen.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the Indians have been deprived of the water they were entitled to by the nonaction or negligence on the part of the Government, ought not the Government in perpetuity furnish the water that they have been unjustly deprived of?

Mr. MONDELL. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman that if, through the act of the Government as guardian of the Indians, the Indians have lost waters to which they were entitled, it is incumbent on the Government to make some provision with regard to it; but I do not think we should make it in this way, and I say that without any desire to criticize the gentlemen, because I realize that they have had a difficult situation to deal with. But it does not seem to me that the method they have adopted is the proper one. It lays an obligation on the Government for all time for this water. It differentiates this 720 cubic feet of water from any other irrigation waters that I have any knowledge of in the arid region.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. In selling storage water, is it not a fact that you sell it by the acre-foot and not by the cubic foot, as provided in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. That is quite frequently done, I will say to my friend from Colorado; but whichever way you do it, if the Government is under any obligation in the matter the obligation is to provide the Indians under the law a water right which they thereafter must protect. Some day these Indians are going to pass out from under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. Some day these lands will be occupied by American citizens of more or less Indian blood, but they will not differ greatly from the people of the surrounding territory, nor will their lands or region differ. Then we will have in that particular locality a water right guaranteed by the Federal Government. It seems to me if it is proper to provide for this water at public expense, it should have been done so as to provide for the purchase under the terms of the statute now on the statute books relating to such matters. This water right should be fixed on the same basis of other water rights in the arid region. I do not like a special and peculiar sort of a water right. It is possible the Secretary of the Interior can, under this authorization, sell and contract for rights so as to place them in the same position as other rights in the region. If he can, I hope he will. Of course, it may be suggested that the form of this right is not material or important. I think it is very important, because it sets up here a perpetual obligation on the Federal Government which will run through all time, after Indians have ceased to be regarded as Indians and when that part of the country is in no respect different as to its civilization, cultivation, and settlement from the balance of the country.

The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has asserted that there is an obligation. I have not gone into the matter carefully. I assume that he is right. The obligation, I would say, can hardly be based on the action of the Secretary of the Interior in assuming to divide these waters. What does the gentleman understand the act of the Secretary really was? Did the Secretary, representing the Government, say that in his opinion these Indians had title to 147 cubic feet of the flow of the stream, and that they were entitled to no more? Did he, representing them and acting for them, accept that as their part of the flow?

The Secretary of the Interior was at the same time the head of the Reclamation Service, and when he rendered that decision, if it were an inequitable decision under the rights existing, what he did was to give to the people who will eventually occupy the Yakima lands a gift which, as you have figured out, amounts to $650,000, and as much more as it may be necessary in perpetuity to establish and maintain those water rights. If the Secretary was right, if he was correct from a legal standpoint, in assuming that is all the water the Indians were entitled to, then the obligation, if there is any obligation, on the part of the Government is an obligation due to the fact that prior Secretaries and prior Indian Commissioners had not, on the part of the Indians, filed on sufficient water and held sufficient water rights. So there is, whichever way you look at it, something of an obligation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There had been a filing made of 1,000 second cubic feet by the Indian agent at one time.

Mr. MONDELL. What Secretary was this?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This apportionment was made under Secretary Hitchcock. The gentleman will understand that at the time there was litigation.

Mr. MONDELL. As between the rights of the Indians and others?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As to the rights of the Indians; an action was brought against the official in charge of the Indians for a diversion of the water by certain companies that claimed that they were not getting the amount of water they were entitled to.

Mr. MONDELL. What I want to emphasize is this: There is no earthly reason why any Indian on any irrigable lands in the West should lose his water rights, if there ever have been any water rights available. All it has ever required was action by the department in making the proper water-right applications and in pursuing them reasonably toward utilization in order to protect them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman makes his statement, I presume, by assuming that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Winters case is not a proper interpretation and construction of the law with relation to the rights of the Indians to waters in rivers that bound Indian reservations. Is that correct?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say that to me it is funny, not to characterize it otherwise, and I doubt if the Supreme Court would have said just what it did say under any other state of facts than those existing in that particular case, because I can not believe that any court anywhere, in a matter affecting an arid region, would finally say that there is a power existing anywhere that may stay development until the crack of doom because there is somebody too indolent or too indifferent to develop or allow development. That kind of theory is monstrous when you attempt to apply it to a country whose very life depends upon the useful application of water; it is contrary to the natural law of things. There can not be any power of that kind anywhere.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, that is the opinion and statement of the gentleman which is in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think it is altogether in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court, but I have not the time or disposition to discuss that decision of the Supreme Court. What I want to emphasize is this. We have heard a good deal of discussion of late in respect to the necessity of fixing by law rights to water Indian lands, so that they never can, through lack of use, be lost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Texas). The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think a provision of that kind would be most unfortunate and unnecessary. It would, in the long run, bring great loss to the Indians and greatly retard development of the western country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to consume the time of the committee further than to say that I have lived in this particular country where this reservation is for the past 37 years, and I do know that this was the home of these Indians for many years prior to my going there, and probably for hundreds of years, and I do know that they did make use of all of that great valley of the Yakima. The Government made a treaty with them and put them on a reservation, and of course the rest of the valley was opened to the whites. At that time this was a great feeding ground for the Indians' stock. By and by it was fenced up and taken over by the whites, and they—the whites—began to procure water rights and utilities of that kind. During his entire life the poor Indian had lived in an environment that gave him no opportunity to know the necessity of acquiring water rights, and he never thought of or had knowledge that he should have to acquire the right to use the water which had been running by him since the beginning of time, and which he had done with as he pleased.

I maintain that if the Government through its agents committed wrongs against the Indians, and did not protect them, and that fact is brought to the attention of Congress, Congress should in some way try to make amends and take care of those wards of the Government.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says that the Government never has granted a water right in this way. I want to say that there has been no similar case under reclamation in the United States, and this would naturally be a precedent. There could not have been anything like it, because this is the only case of the kind that I have ever heard of. I think this is only a simple act of justice, that the United States Government should provide sufficient water there in perpetuity for the benefit of these Indians who have given up this great valley to the United States Government for the benefit of the white race.

And I beseech the membership of this House to do this act of justice. I have no desire to take up the time of the House, because I am as much interested in the reclamation extension bill as anybody, and in this same valley are two of these reclamation projects, but my sense of justice in this case to my district compels me to ask for time in order that I might beg that justice be done to these Indians, just as I would ask that justice be done to the white residents of that valley under like circumstances. Mr. Speaker, I will not take up any further time and will yield back any time I may not have used.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman satisfied with the amendment that has been proposed and agreed to by the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am willing to accept it, as I think that is the best we can do at this time. I might wish it even more liberal to these Indians, but I will offer no objection, as I am anxious that they should get much-needed relief.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed four minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, probably I shall not consume all of that time. I want to know whether I understand this situation correctly. As I understand it the Yakima Indians, on their reservation, have about 120,000 acres of irrigable land, which is subject to be irrigated with water from the Yakima River, and that they have more or less of an adequate irrigation system, but that under a decision of the Secretary of the Interior some years ago they were given in a decision the right to 147 cubic feet of water per second for irrigation purposes, that not being anything like one-half of the water which was available. I understand that just across the river is other land which is subject to be irrigated and upon which there were some private irrigation projects which have since been absorbed by the Government as a reclamation project under the Reclamation Service, and that the other side of the river was receiving four, five, or six times, whatever the amount was, I do not remember exactly, of water which the Indians were receiving on their side of the river, though, naturally, the lands on both sides of the river were equally available for irrigation. Now, we have discovered that the Secretary of the Interior made an unfair and inequitable division of the water, and that the Indians ought to have enough water to permit each Indian allotee on these 120 000 acres to irrigate 40 acres of land, which, as I understand, would amount to somewhere in the neighborhood of sixty, seventy, or eighty thousand acres of land to be irrigated, and that first the commission which was appointed and now the conferees of the committee propose to guarantee to these Indians in perpetuity 720 cubic feet of water per second, instead of 147 cubic feet of water which they are now receiving or to which they are entitled. But that there is not water enough in the river under natural conditions to furnish this amount of water. In other words, if there were to be a new division now and no one was in occupancy of the land on either side we probably would give the Indians half and reserve half to be used on the other side of the river for the public lands, but the other side of the river having been settled upon and being now tilled by the people who went there under the original private reclamation project, now a public reclamation project which absorbed them, with a fixed charge agreed upon both as to construction and as to maintenance, that it would be unfair for us now to put any extra charge upon those people, and that it would be unfair for the Government, as it seems to me, to make those people who went there, not in contemplation of an injustice which had been done to the Indians, but with the understanding they would receive a certain amount of water at a certain rate, it would be unfair to try to cut off the amount of water which they are to receive or to increase the charge that is to be made against them for that water. We want to do justice to the Indians.

According to the report of the commission we have to provide additional water, and the way to provide additional water is by impounding the water in reservoirs, because the shortage of water is at the season of low water, and as I understand there is plenty of water if it is impounded and there is opportunity to impound it, and, as a matter of fact, a part of it has been already impounded. Now, the Reclamation Service, under a decision of the Secretary of the Interior, got a larger proportion of this water than it was fairly entitled to when that decision was made. The decision gave the Reclamation Service a much larger proportion of the water than it gave to the Indian reservation, although the two were occupying identically similar positions on opposite sides of the river, and each lot of land should have been entitled to half.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. How much irrigable land was on each side?

Mr. MANN. About 120 000 acres on each side.

Mr. FERRIS. Subject to irrigation?

Mr. MANN. Subject to irrigation. As we can not add to the charge against the white settlers on their side of the river so likewise we can not charge the Indians on their side of the river for the cost of impounding the water that we may furnish to them when if we had not taken it away from them they would have received it without that cost, and it seems to be perfectly sure in both cases. But it is an odd thing in the end in all of these claims that it is Uncle Sam who is to be touched. The reclamation project, as it were, robbed the Indians of the water. I say "robbed." There is nothing criminal about it. This is under a decision of the Secretary of the Interior who was at the head of both services. Now, what do we propose to do? We propose to take out of the General Treasury and pay into the reclamation fund the cost of restoring those conditions.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. There are about 2,300 of these Indians.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how many.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand there are that number. Do they farm at all?

Mr. MANN. I understand they do.

Mr. FERRIS. It seems to me, under the gentleman's statement—and I have followed him very closely; I do not know anything about it—but it seems to hinge largely on whether or not the Indians will get the benefit of the money that is proposed to be appropriated, because if it is appropriated for a lot more white people it ought not to be done.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly the Indians will get the benefit of it. In other words, it is not possible to furnish water to the Indians to irrigate the 40-acre tract for each of the allottees without taking the water from the white settlers on the other side of the river, or else impounding the water so that they will have a greater supply than they would have under low-water conditions. But I can not understand why the reclamation fund should not have this appropriation charged to it. This is an appropriation here to take out of the General Treasury and turn into the reclamation fund a sum of money in order to restore conditions to what they were before the Reclamation Service robbed the Indians of their share of the water.

Mr. FERRIS. Where was the Indian Service, with their reclamation bureau, that they were not on the job to see to it that the Indians got their rights?

Mr. MANN. I expect that was before they got started very far. That was before anybody knew very much about the irrigation service at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Before the irrigation service was completed.

Mr. MANN. Nobody knows much about the reclamation business now, and they have known less since the sad experience we have had since 1905.

Mr. FERRIS. Under the law, if the gentleman will yield, the question of water rights in the West is one of use, is it not?

Mr. MANN. I am not going to deal with that question. I do not agree with half of these gentlemen about the matter. I think the Government has the right to reserve the water, if it wants to do so, for the benefit of the Indians, just as much of a right, or a greater right, as to reserve the land if it wants to do so. Of course, I know these States out there operated by the white settlers are endeavoring to put up a different theory of law in order to rob the Indians of their water.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think there is really anything in the suggestion that this ought to come out of the reclamation fund? Does it not come out of the Treasury anyway, ultimately? For instance, I would just as soon the gentleman would pay me, if he owed me an obligation, out of his salary fund as out of the great fund that he may have from his private investment.

Mr. MANN. Unfortunately, I do not owe the gentleman from South Dakota any money, but if I did it would have to be paid out of my salary

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman made a statement a moment ago that I wish he would modify a little, because I do not think he means it.

Mr. MANN. I have not time to stop to modify statements, because I am not through with them yet.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman said we took this position because we wanted to rob the Indians. Of course, the gentleman knows that is not our standpoint, but that what we want to do is to see these lands yield crops.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not object to a mild statement like that?

Mr. MANN. Here is an actual case where a commission of both Houses of Congress have decided in polite language that we did rob the Indians of their right to the water, and it is now proposed, instead of taking the cost of restoring the right to the Indians out of the reclamation fund which received the benefit of the water which was taken, that we shall take the cost out of the General Treasury and pay it into the reclamation fund. I do not see how anybody can defend the proposition. The reclamation fund has received the benefit of this extra water. Now, of course I do not think that the settlers on this reclamation project there now, with certain charges fixed, ought to have this extra cost put upon them, because very likely they never would have taken the land if they had been compelled to meet these high costs. But the reclamation fund, which we set aside, consisting of the proceeds of the sale and lease of the public lands, for reclamation purposes, having received the benefit of this water taken away from the Indians, and now having restored it by a reservoir, wants the General Treasury to pay back to the general reclamation fund this expense and to restore the conditions that were there before it mixed in with it.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman's premises are right, this land got the extra water in that particular project, but I understand he finally proposes to charge it up to them. With what consistency can the gentleman say that some project in Colorado ought to pay for some project over in the State of Washington?

Mr. MANN. There would not be any consistency in that, and if the gentleman thinks for a moment it would not be charged to any project in Colorado——

Mr. FERRIS. Be charged to the whole fund.

Mr. MANN. If that comes out of the fund in the Treasury, it does not add to the cost of any project or is not charged to any project.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Suppose this was to be paid out of the reclamation fund, and there is not any money in the reclamation fund, then what are you going to do? We want this water furnished to these Indians.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says, "Suppose it should be paid out of the reclamation fund." And I suppose he means that there is no money in the reclamation fund; but there is money in the reclamation fund.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Has not that fund been drawn from so that there will not be anything to spare from it in this generation?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It is a question merely in these cases, in regard to the reclamation fund, whether we authorize the commencement of a lot of new projects that cost the Lord knows how much. We have got to finish the existing projects, although they cost a great deal more than was anticipated.

We have not only got to finish these projects, but we have got to finish them upon terms much more favorable to the settlers than was contemplated. That is carried in the irrigation bill now pending in the House. But upon what theory can anyone say, the money being in the Treasury, just a certain amount there, whether it is in the reclamation fund or otherwise—and it is only a matter of bookkeeping—upon what theory can gentlemen say that in order to reduce the total cost for all reclamation service, that when the reclamation fund has received the benefit of taking water which the Government has to restore, then we have got to pay for that out of the General Treasury, and, as a matter of bookkeeping, turn into the reclamation fund?

Mr STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that by saying it is a gratuity?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, a report (No. 1042) on House Document No. 1006, relative to letter of Acting Secretary of the Treasury, which was ordered printed.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table four Senate pension bills of similar title granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, namely, the bill S. 4969, the bill S. 5278, the bill S. 5501, and the bill S. 5899, with House amendments thereto, and ask that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bills by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4969. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5278. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5501. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5899. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bills just reported, to insist upon the House amendments thereto, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

LANDS AT HEADWATERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. FERRIS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. FERRIS. I rise for the purpose of calling up the conference report on the bill S. 1784.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to call up the conference report on the bill S. 1784. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, where is my friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Oklahoma has agreed that if the consideration of his conference report shall take more than three minutes he will yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1784) restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and tributaries, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same.

SCOTT FERRIS,
JAMES M. GRAHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. MYERS,
M. A. SMITH,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the effect of the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. It is a bill similar to one introduced by Mr. LINDBERGH. It is a Senate bill. The House put on an amendment, and the Senate refused to agree to the amendment, and the House asked for a conference, and the Senate receded from its disagreement to the House amendment. All that the House needs to do now is to occupy the same position it occupied before.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PAYMENT UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 4628. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 4628, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 4628, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill for amendment, as follows:

INCREASE OF CHARGES.

SEC. 4. That no increase in the construction charges shall hereafter be made, after the same have been fixed by public notice, except by agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and a majority of the water-right applicants and entrymen to be affected by such increase, whereupon all water-right applicants and entrymen in the area proposed to be affected by the increased charge shall become subject thereto. Such increased charge shall be added to the construction charge and payment thereof distributed over the remaining unpaid installments of construction charges: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may agree that such increased construction charge shall be paid in additional annual installments, each of which shall be at least equal to the amount of the largest installment as fixed for the project by the public notice theretofore issued. And such additional installments of the increased construction charge, as so agreed upon, shall become due and payable on December 1 of each year subsequent to the year when the final installment of the construction charge under such public notice is due and payable: Provided further, That all such increased construction charges shall be subject to the same conditions, penalties, and suit or action as provided in section 3 of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Arizona what is the effect of this proposed legislation as compared with the existing law? If the Reclamation Service makes a mistake about what the cost is going to be, who is to pay that?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the public notice fixing the construction charge has been issued, any expenditure made thereafter will result in a direct loss to the reclamation fund, because the water users on the projects can only be required to pay the amount fixed in the public notice. But if it is necessary to expend additional money on the project, we provide that the water users shall be consulted about the matter. If a majority of them agree to the increased charge, all shall be bound by the new contract.

Mr. MANN. And if they do not agree to it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Then this bill provides that the expenditure shall not be made.

Mr. MANN. What is the time of giving public notice now?

Mr. HAYDEN. Section 4 of the reclamation act provides:

That upon the determination by the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable, he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of the same, * * * and thereupon he shall give public notice * * * of the charges which shall be made per acre upon the said entries, and upon lands in private ownership which may be irrigated by the waters of the said irrigation project.

In practice, however, the Secretary has not followed the letter of the law, but has delayed issuing the public notice until the work on projects is almost completed.

For instance, on the projects in Arizona no public notice has yet been issued, although the first contracts for their construction were made over 10 years ago. Anything that is expended is still chargeable to the water users.

Mr. MANN. There has been a great deal of complaint in reference to this increased cost. Now, has that increased cost come before or after public notice has been given on these projects?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Before.

Mr. HAYDEN. All expenditures on the Arizona project have been made prior to the issuance of the public notice.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not answering for the Arizona project alone.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understand that on one project in Wyoming where a public notice was issued some further expenditures were undertaken thereafter for drainage, under a special agreement that the increased charge would be paid. As a rule, but little expenditure has been made by the Reclamation Service after the public notice has been issued. I understand there are some cases, however, where there might be loss to the Government unless a new contract is made with the water users as provided in this section.

Mr. MANN. What is the necessity for making this provision?

Mr. HAYDEN. In order that all the water users shall be bound by the new contract. When the water user accepts the provision of his act he agrees that if a majority of the water users under his project request the Government to make an additional expenditure, and it is made, he will be bound to pay his share of the increased cost, although he may individually vote against the increase.

Mr. MANN. Are they not bound by it now?

Mr. HAYDEN. As the law stands at present there is a possibility of loss to the reclamation fund if the Government spends any money on a project after the public notice is issued, because the water users are not bound to return that money to the fund. We have tried to cure that defect in the law by this provision that no such expenditure shall be made unless the water users first agree to it. If they do agree, then they ought to pay.

Mr. MADDEN. It might amount to half of the total expenditure.

Mr. HAYDEN. Possibly; but this provision remedies that defect in the law.

Mr. MADDEN. This simply puts the water user in the position of being compelled to return the money which may be expended after the public notice is issued.

Mr. HAYDEN. If a majority of the water users agree to pay for additional construction on a project, then all are bound by that agreement.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose a reclamation project is started, after public notice has been given that it will cost so much per acre, and then it is found that it will require more than that to finish it. Under this provision, how is that managed?

Mr. HAYDEN. The proposition is submitted to the water users by the Secretary of the Interior, who says that a certain expenditure must be made in order to complete the project. And he asks them, "Do you consent that this expenditure be made?" If a majority of them consent to it, the expenditure can be made, and they will all be charged with the cost of the work

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose they refuse to consent to it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Then the expenditure can not be made. This bill prohibits the Secretary of the Interior from spending additional money on a project unless a majority of the water users give their consent.

Mr. FOSTER. Then what becomes of the project?

Mr. HAYDEN. It will be an incomplete project. They have got to get along with what they already have.

Mr. FOSTER. Then they would be assessed to pay for the uncompleted project?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; the water users will pay for the work already done.

Mr. NORTON. I find that in the case of several of the projects which have already been undertaken the Reclamation Service has made preliminary surveys of near-by projects and has incurred very large expenses in making these surveys, and then in the construction of the approved projects has made gross mistakes of engineering and has incurred large and unnecessary and unjustifiable expenses in attempting to carry out certain theories and experiments pertaining to irrigation. Then at the time of the notice to the settlers of the cost of construction of the project all these expenses of preliminary surveys of near-by and abandoned projects and the useless and unjustifiable expenses occasioned by wild and impractical theories of officers and employees of the Reclamation Service are covered into the grand total purported cost of construction and imposed as a part of the construction charges upon the settlers on the project. This is preeminently unfair to these settlers, who ordinarily have so many other burdens and difficulties to contend with. Why has the committee seen fit not to provide in this bill any relief for the settlers from these unjust charges?

Mr. HAYDEN. We have not take up that question in this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the last word.

As I understand the situation affected by the section which has just been read, it is this: There has been a great deal of difference of opinion as to the proper interpretation of section 4 of the original irrigation law. In the first place, there has been a question as to whether we contemplated the return to the fund of all the expenditure on a project or a return to the fund of the estimated cost of the project. The language of the section is:

The said charges shall be determined with a view to returning to the reclamation fund the estimated cost of construction and shall be apportioned equitably.

Now, it has been my view that after the Secretary of the Interior had given the public notice provided in the reclamation law and had fixed the charge per acre, that thereafter no additional charge could be made which the entryman was obliged to pay, even though the project might cost more than the amount fixed. But the fact is that in practice the service has in a number of cases where the public notice had been given increased the charges under the project. In the majority of these cases, however, that has been done where work undertaken was not contemplated, or the necessity for which could not be foreseen at the time the project was undertaken. In the case of the project in my State, which has been referred to, the additional expense was for drainage, an expense which could not well have been foreseen.

Now, section 5 of the so-called bond act, the act under which a loan was made to the reclamation fund at 3 per cent, they changed the law somewhat in regard to the issuance of notice by a provision that thereafter no entryman should be permitted to go on the land until the Secretary should have established the unit of entry and the water charge and the date when the water could be applied. That provision was to prevent, in the first place, the location of a large number of settlers on the land prior to the time when they could be supplied with water. But it was intended also to prohibit the Secretary from fixing charges until he had proceeded so far with the construction that he could accurately estimate the cost. Under these circumstances if an estimate was carefully made there would be little question of increased charges thereafter.

Now, this provision of section 5 of the bond act and the experience of the Secretary and the Reclamation Service has led them to be careful about fixing charges until the time had arrived when they could be certain as to the ultimate and final cost of the project. They have been so careful in that respect that on the great project in Arizona—the Salt River project—and on a number of other projects the final notice has not yet been issued.

Now, there has been this difficulty in connection with additional costs which were really necessary. I refer again to the Wyoming project where the drainage was necessary and essential. There were some tracts that did not need to be drained, but the project as a whole needed extensive draining. It has been the view of some that such an additional cost could not be legally placed upon all the settlers unless they agreed to it. On most of the projects the settlers have agreed to these increased costs. This section, if it becomes a law, will enable the Secretary when the necessity for additional expenditures becomes apparent, necessity for additional storage, additional supply, or for the drainage of the land after it has been irrigated—whenever these expenditures become necessary it will be possible under the law to present the matter to the settlers and have them decide whether they will be content to take the project as it is, with possibly a slightly insufficient amount of water, or with insufficient drainage, whether they will bear these handicaps or remove them themselves, or by agreement under this section bring all the lands under the project subject to the additional cost necessitated by these improvements and these betterments.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any doubt anywhere about the right of the Government to charge all the money expended on a project or projects, that it ought to be cleared up. There is no more reason on earth why the Government should spend money it receives from the sale of public land for irrigation projects without the right to charge it all to the project, than there is that a private individual in the United States should have the right to the payment of money out of the Public Treasury without any consideration. The question ought to be settled definitely, and the gentleman from Wyoming, I understood, said there was some doubt about whether in some cases even now the Government could charge moneys expended on irrigation projects to the projects or assess it against the land.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. This paragraph is intended to remove any question in the future in regard to that matter, and the questions in the past have been, so far as I know, all cleared up.

Mr. MADDEN. The way to remove any doubt about it, in my mind, is to require in this bill that the Secretary of the Interior come before the Congress of the United States every year with the estimate of what it is going to cost to do the work for the current year and give the opportunity to Congress to learn in advance what projects are under way and what they are likely to cost, and what it is hoped to accomplish by the expenditure of the money.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that that is all set forth in the annual reports.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not have to pass upon the annual reports. We ought to pass on them in advance. The time has come when the Interior Department ought not to be permitted to spend money on projects for reclamation where it is absolutely impossible to obtain water. I understand that such expenditures have been made. I believe that all such extravagances could be avoided if the Congress, through one of its important committees had the right to pass upon the question in advance. It may be fairly assumed that the cost of the project is what is expended upon it, not what it is estimated it will cost; and to say that there is any doubt whether the proper charge should be the estimate of the cost or the cost itself is absurd. There ought to be but one conclusion on the question, and that is that every dollar expended should be charged to the project.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the time to yield. As far as I am concerned, I hope the House will never adopt any measure which limits the charge to the estimated cost, for it does not matter how expert the man who makes the estimates may be conditions are likely to arise that he could not have foreseen, and I never yet saw an engineering project in which changes had not to be made before it was concluded; and it is fair to assume that projects of the kind sought to be made under the pending bill will have similar difficulties, which the engineers will be obliged to surmount. While nobody here has any disposition to impose any undue burdens upon the people who live upon these lands—and, on the contrary, I believe everybody here is anxious to alleviate all of their troubles, so far as it is consistent with right and justice—yet there should be, and I hope there will be before this bill is passed, a provision inserted in it to require the men in charge of the Reclamation Service to come annually before the Committee on Appropriations with a full statement of just what it is hoped to accomplish by the expenditure sought to be made in any given year.

The Clerk read as follows:

OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE.

SEC. 5. That in addition to the construction charge, every water-right applicant, entryman, or landowner under or upon a reclamation project shall also pay, whenever water service is available for the irrigation of his land, an operation and maintenance charge based upon the total cost of operation and maintenance of the project, or each separate unit thereof, and such charge shall be made for each acre-foot of water delivered; but each acre of irrigable land, whether irrigated or not, shall be charged with a minimum maintenance and operation charge based upon the charge for delivery of not less than 1 acre-foot of water: Provided, That, whenever any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district shall so request, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to transfer to such water users' association or irrigation district the care, operation, and maintenance of all or any part of the project works, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. If the total amount of operation and maintenance charges and penalties collected for any one irrigation season on any project shall exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project during that irrigation season, the balance shall be applied to a reduction of the charge on the project for the next irrigation season, and any deficit incurred may likewise be added to the charge for the next irrigation season.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 5, line 11, strike out the word "maintenance" and insert the word "operation," and in the same line strike out the word "operation" and insert the word "maintenance."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suppose those committee amendments which we just adopted are very important. The Senate proposes that we charge the cost of "maintenance and operation" and the great committee of the House insists that we shall charge the cost of "operation and maintenance." Possibly the Senate went upon the theory of putting the two words according to their alphabetical order, with the first letter of the word, and I suppose the House committee just thought that they would reverse it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. I may say to the gentleman that throughout the bill the phrase "operation and maintenance" is referred to, and in that particular place the words were transposed and we made it uniform.

Mr. MANN. What is the present law with reference to this operation and maintenance and minimum charge which is put upon land which is not irrigated?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the original reclamation act made no provision for segregating the construction charge from the charges for operation and maintenance, but in this section we differentiate between these charges. The Supreme Court of the United States decided in the Sweigert case that the Reclamation Service could collect an operation and maintenance charge prior to issuing the public notice and that it was not necessary to pay operation and maintenance expenses out of the reclamation fund and then wait 10 or 20 years to have the money repaid. The court was able to make this decision on account of some Indian irrigation legislation, which the court construed as amendatory of the reclamation act.

Mr. MANN. What is the existing law with reference to the operation and maintenance charge?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is based on this Supreme Court decision that the Reclamation Service can charge for operation and maintenance and collect the amounts due annually. We follow this decision and make it clear in this bill by segregating the charge for construction from the charges for operation and maintenance.

Mr. MANN. What is the existing law with reference to the minimum charge where the water is not actually used?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no law upon the subject. Under certain projects the water users have agreed that where water is available for the land a minimum charge shall be made for the use of the water that the United States is ready to serve the people with. There is no reason why a man should be permitted to speculate on his land by holding it out of cultivation and let people who are actually farming their land bear the entire cost of operation and maintenance.

Land seekers in new countries can be divided into two classes: Those who are interested chiefly in opportunities to speculate in land and those who sincerely desire to make homes on the land and engage in agriculture or stock raising as their principal means of livelihood.

I do not say that the speculator has no proper place in the existing scheme of things. Upon the contrary, I have great admiration for the man who will take a chance. This does not mean, however, that we should provide by law that such men shall always have the best seat in the car of prosperity. They can take care of themselves and need no paternalistic help from the Government. The man who honestly desires to make a home is the one who needs and should receive our assistance. The provision to which the gentleman refers is to strike at speculation in land.

Mr. MANN. I am trying to get at specific information as to whether there is any law on that subject at the present time. This proposes to put a charge on land which is not actually irrigated of 1 foot per acre.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the average amount of water used on these projects—how many feet per acre?

Mr. HAYDEN. In the southern projects about 4 acre-feet; farmers in Montana and Idaho could get along with 2½ or 3 acre-feet.

Mr. MANN. This would be from 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. HAYDEN. The minimum charge ought to be at least that high.

Mr. MANN. And if the man who pays this minimum charge desires to get water thereafter he is entitled to that water?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; up to the minimum amount he paid.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Colorado stated this morning that where a man did not use water under the law out there and somebody else did use it, the man who did not use it lost his right to it. Here is a project where, say, half the land is not irrigated, half the water is not used at the time. Does the land which pays for this 1 acre-foot of water thereby become entitled to such water as may be necessary whenever it wants it?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. The law in the West generally is that if land lies out of irrigation for five years it loses its water rights. The right lapses in that time.

Mr. MANN. Then the owner of the land pays for 1 acre-foot of water for five years, and not having received it, thereafter he is cut out?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; he would be, because the right to use the water depends upon its use on the land and not upon the payment of assessments. This provision is designed to prevent speculation. On some projects as much as 20 per cent of the land that the Government is ready to serve with water is not being cultivated, and the result is that the other four-fifths are required to carry the burden of the operation and maintenance for the sake of speculators. The Government is ready to deliver the water and there is no reason why these men should be allowed to hold their lands out of cultivation. We propose to assess a minimum charge against such land.

I am also informed that under certain projects where the country is not entirely arid and where wet years sometimes occur, that a part of the settlers will sometimes decide that they will not irrigate their lands, but will take the chances and dry farm them. The result is that the whole burden of operation and maintenance is placed upon a part of the landowners. These charges are like taxes and should be borne by all alike. It is as if a part of the citizens of this city would decide that they did not need police or fire protection this year and so would pay nothing toward the maintenance of the municipal government. This provision will make it possible to do justice in such a situation.

Mr. MANN. I believe usually, where we have water furnished in a city where the water mains are laid, they charge a certain amount against the property whether it is connected or not.

Mr. HAYDEN. The minimum operation and maintenance charge provided for in this bill is based on the same theory.

Mr. MANN. But in a city when a man does need the water he can get it.

Mr. HAYDEN. He could here.

Mr. MADDEN. He could not after five years.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say he could not.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the land is withheld from cultivation and for speculation after five years it might lose the right to water.

Mr. MANN. There might be speculation and there might not be speculation. Now, the gentleman says the law—of course we are making law in reference to this. When we impound water I suppose we have some authority to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. The situation, as I understand it with regard to this matter of maintenance and operation, is this: The reclamation law contains no reference to operation and maintenance. When we first undertook these projects the practice was to include 10 years' operation and maintenance in the construction charge. In other words, to the estimated cost of construction was added the estimate of the maintenance charge for the period within which payments were to be made. That was not found practicable. The maintenance and operation charge was not always paid, as the construction charge was not always paid. Furthermore, the landowner who did not apply for a water right was not required to pay any operation and maintenance charge. The water ran past the land, and the owner was in the position, as the gentleman from Illinois illustrated, of the owner of a city lot who got the benefit from the building of a public main and was not required to pay anything if he did not use water.

Mr. MANN. He is required.

Mr. MONDELL. I know he is. I said the situation was the same as it would be if he were not. Now, it is to cure that general situation that we have this provision, and the effect of it is to compel the landowners who have not applied for water to pay at least the minimum charge for the water that runs past their land if they decline to use it.

Mr. MADDEN. Does it limit the right of the use of the water after a period of nonuse?

Mr. MONDELL. No; the situation in regard to that is this: The receiving of water under an operation and maintenance charge does not necessarily give to the owner of the land any right to the water in perpetuity. He acquires the right to water in perpetuity under an application for a water right and under a contract under which he agrees to pay for the water right over and above the yearly cost for maintenance.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question right there?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment—and a man might be charged operation and maintenance charges who refuses to apply for a water right for a series of years without getting any right at all to the perpetual use of the water.

Mr. MADDEN. Is he prohibited by anything in this bill from making application to get a right to the use of the water?

Mr. MONDELL. No; on the contrary. Under a section which follows this we endeavor to persuade him to make his application for a water right by increasing his charges 5 per cent each year that he neglects to make his application. In other words, if he does not apply this year, if the water is ready for him, he will have to pay 5 per cent more in building charges when he applies next year, and each year he fails adds 5 per cent to the building charges he must ultimately pay.

Mr. MADDEN. So that he might be compelled to pay 200 per cent increased building charges?

Mr. MONDELL. His charges would grow every year, but the probability is under this provision for an increased building charge we will get these people who now are endeavoring to hold their land for speculation to apply for water rights. They must pay at least the minimum charge for water for an acre-foot, and under the section that follows we also add to their building charge unless they do apply for water rights. This really has no reference to the acquirement of a water right. It has no reference to the question of loss of water right by nonuser.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there anything anywhere that refers to the loss of a water right?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; the reclamation laws of all the States provide for that.

Mr. MADDEN. In our law; in the United States laws?

Mr. MONDELL. Section 8 of the reclamation law puts all these things, rights and loss of water rights, under the local laws which are in force in all the States.

Mr. MADDEN. So that is equivalent to a prohibition of the use of the water.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no. The gentleman understands that under the reclamation law the Secretary of the Interior applies for a water right for these lands under the State law, just as a private individual does, in accordance with the State statute. These people do not differ in their rights at all from their neighbors, who also use water. The only difference is that they are dealing with the Secretary of the Interior, where the others are dealing with private parties or cooperative associations.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENALTIES.

SEC. 6. That all operation and maintenance charges shall become due and payable on the date fixed for each project by the Secretary of the Interior, and if such charge is paid on or before the date when due there shall be a discount of 5 per cent of such charge; but if such charge is unpaid on the first day of the third calendar month thereafter, a penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid shall be added thereto, and thereafter an additional penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid shall be added on the first day of each calendar month if such charge and penalties shall remain unpaid, and no water shall be delivered to the lands of any water-right applicant or entryman who shall be in arrears for more than one calendar year for the payment of any charge for operation and maintenance or any annual construction charge and penalties. If any water-right applicant or entryman shall be one year in default in the payment of any charge for operation and maintenance and penalties, or any part thereof, his water-right application, and if he be a homestead entryman his entry also, shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior suit or action may be brought for the amounts in default and penalties in like manner as provided in section 3 of this act.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 6, line 18, strike out the word "default" and insert the word "arrears" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In fixing the operation and maintenance charges, which

I suppose are fixed annually, is the Secretary supposed to fix them at what they are or a good deal above what they are?

Mr. HAYDEN. I know what the gentleman is alluding to. In providing for a discount of 5 per cent we adopted the same plan as you find when you pay your gas or electric-light bill here in Washington. A great many public-service corporations adopt this scheme, with the idea that if a man can get a rebate he will pay a little bit more promptly than if he is charged a penalty for failure to pay on time.

Mr. MANN. And if there is an excess, that is credited the next year to the fund?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and cared for in that way.

Mr. MONDELL. Or if there is a loss, it is added.

Mr. MANN. If there is a loss, it is added.

Mr. HAYDEN. It was believed that this plan would facilitate collections on the reclamation projects.

Mr. MANN. Now, what does this mean where it says that the water right or the entry shall be subject to cancellation? Does that mean it shall be canceled, or is that discretionary?

Mr. HAYDEN. That provision is in all of the public-land laws, and we repeat the language used in the original reclamation act when we say that the entry shall be subject to cancellation.

Mr. MANN. When you say that it "shall be subject to cancellation," it is directory to the department. It does not leave it discretionary with the department as to whether it shall exercise the power or not.

Mr. HAYDEN. An entry may be canceled if the entryman does not comply with the law. The law does not say "shall be canceled." If it did, the Secretary would have no option at all, but would be compelled to cancel the entry immediately.

Mr. MANN. Does the Secretary have discretionary authority as to whether it shall be canceled or not?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. The Secretary can give an entryman further time in which to comply with the law.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that he violated the law and somebody else wanted to enter the land, the other man has the right.

Mr. HAYDEN. Some Government inspector may think the law has been violated, or the man who is contesting the entry may think so, but if upon investigation it is found that the law has been complied with, the entryman has an opportunity to prove his good faith, and the entry will not be canceled.

Mr. MANN. But here is a proposition: A man could have gone upon this property and built a house upon it and barns upon it and reduced it to tillable condition and had everything in good order, and then died, and there would be no possible way of raising money to pay operating charges for more than a year's time; now, there could be no controversy as to whether money has been paid or not, as that is a matter of open books, and you say that if this charge is not paid within a year the entry shall be subject to cancellation and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund. Now, is there any exception for the case that I have stated?

Mr. HAYDEN. It seems to me that the Secretary would not immediately order the entry canceled on the day the time expired.

Mr. MANN. Very likely he would not. The question is whether somebody else has the right to make an entry; whether the man or his estate has forfeited its or their rights and somebody else can come in.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that the Secretary of the Interior has those matters pending before him on every project now, all the time, and it was the opinion of the committee—of all of us who live adjacent to these projects—that it should be left to his discretion; and we thought it better and safer to give the Secretary of the Interior the power to forfeit and also the power to bring suit and obtain judgment for the amount, and he can hold that as against the property.

Mr. MANN. But I do not see where any discretion is lodged. It says that all payments made by him shall be forfeited to the reclamation fund.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In case the Secretary does declare it is a forfeiture and proceeds to wipe him out, then the man loses everything he put in.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The last sentence in section 6 says:

> In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, suit or action may be brought for the amounts in default and penalties in like manner as provided in section 3 of this act.

Section 3 provides, in the proviso:

> That if the Secretary of the Interior shall so elect, he may cause suit or action to be brought for the recovery of the amount in default and penalties; but if suit or action be brought, the right to declare a cancellation and forfeiture shall be suspended pending such suit or action.

I call attention to this to show that it is recognized to be discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior throughout as to whether there is to be any cancellation or suit brought or not.

Mr. MANN. According to the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska, when the right to cancel arises the Secretary can bring a suit if he wants to do so. Pending that suit he need not forfeit, but unless he brings a suit he must forfeit?

Now, that seems like a ridiculously harsh proposition. There will be many cases arise where the Secretary ought not to be required to bring a suit or a forfeiture, and gentlemen from the Western States will be annoyed themselves and will come before Congress and insist upon our granting them special relief.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I insist that it would be very well to place in section 6 an amendment similar to that in section 3. In line 19, section 3, the proviso is made that on account of default the entry will not be subject to contest; that no entryman for homestead shall be subject to contest on account of such default.

Mr. MANN. I think some such provision ought to be put in. What does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] say to that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have no objection especially, but we do not think it is necessary. We have confidence in the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I will give the gentleman fair notice that if I should be in the House when these special bills come up I shall object to them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We do not object to that amendment, but we do not look upon it as necessary.

Mr. MANN. We have this situation coming up all the time—a few distinguished gentlemen from those States where you have these public-land laws coming in constantly and wanting this legislation or that legislation which is inexorable in its terms, and the moment the terms become operative you want to be released from them, and when it is suggested that a proper provision be inserted in the first place you decline to agree to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The phrase "subject to cancellation" has been in the land laws from time immemorial, and its character and effect are well understood. Rendering an entry subject to cancellation is necessarily not providing for its cancellation. It is simply putting in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior the right to cancel.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; in just a moment. The only reason why under the homestead law—but not applying to the reclamation entries, because we have expressly so provided—the only reason why under the homestead law the provision, "subject to cancellation" is equivalent to cancellation under certain conditions arises from the right of contest under which an entry having been made subject to cancellation and an intervening adverse right having attached, it must be canceled if the contest is successful. But we have specifically provided that these entries can not be contested for failure to comply with the law, and therefore no intervening adverse right can attach and make absolute the liability to cancellation.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman says that we have provided that on account of these defaults no contest can be entered. Now, will the gentleman tell me, where has the provision been made that because of the defaults in payment in operating and maintenance charges no contests can be initiated?

Mr. MONDELL. Not in any place, because it is unnecessary.

Mr. NORTON. Why unnecessary?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it was unnecessary, in my opinion, in section 3 because it has been continuously held that failure to comply with the provisions of the reclamation law does not give the right to contest. No contest has been allowed against any reclamation homestead for failure to comply with the provisions of the law.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman maintain that that is the practice of the Interior Department?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the law on the subject—and I want to call it to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, because he is charging us with being severe to our settlers, which we are not, because we are trying to be fair and not severe. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this provision is the present law. We are not changing it. It has been the law since the reclamation law was put on the statute book, and under this provision the Secretary of the Interior need never cancel an entry. It makes the entry subject to cancellation. There is no mandatory provision that it shall be canceled, and without a mandatory provision that it shall be canceled there is no way in which anyone can compel the Secretary to act.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. This is just a continuation of the present law. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cancel for failure to comply with the law by making the entry subject to cancellation. The operation of the law is this, that in a condition such as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred to, where death or dire misfortune makes it difficult for the entryman to comply with the law, the Secretary can give the entryman such time as he sees fit within which to make his payments, during which time, however, his entry is suspended, although he may have the use of it. In order to afford further relief in difficult cases, a provision was made under which suit might be brought. But it is not necessary to bring suit, because in the Secretary's discretion he can delay action upon the proposition of cancellation for any reasonable length of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have two minutes more, Mr. Chairman. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, this discussion seems to be as to what the words in the text mean. Will the gentleman permit me to offer this suggestion, that the phraseology be changed in line 21 so as to read "may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be canceled; and if canceled, all payments made by him forfeited"? That makes it plain.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, that language would not, in my opinion, in any way affect or change this legislation or change the provision we have. We have used the language that has been used since the beginning of the land laws relative to the cancellation of entries, rendering them subject to cancellation. Now, we have gone further in regard to certain classes of land, and we have required their cancellation and provided that they shall be subject to cancellation, and upon proof of certain facts shall be canceled. But we have not done that in this case.

We of the West are certainly anxious to give the entryman every chance and opportunity, and the bill is evidence of it. It is necessary, as everyone knows, to make an entry subject to cancellation if the law is not complied with; but the Secretary has full discretion to give the parties an opportunity to cure the default. There is one change I would like to have made, and that is to have a provision under which an entryman who has made considerable payments and loses out may get back a reasonable amount of what he has paid.

We have left that discretion with the Secretary, as we have under other laws as to cancellation. Now, it is true that under the general homestead law the right to initiate a contest may put in operation an adverse right, so that if the Secretary holds that the entry is subject to cancellation and an adverse right intervenes, then it must be canceled. But so long as you fail to give the right, or do not give the right, which you should not give, to contest, then under this provision the Secretary can take care of it, does take care of it, and only cancels cases where there is no reasonably satisfactory attempt made to comply with the law.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman asks why we do not put in this provision with regard to operation and maintenance penalties. They have nothing to do with the entry itself. That is a penalty on operation or maintenance charge. It does not go to the entry. It affects lands upon which no entries have ever been made. It affects the landowner who never applied for a water right. It affects the landowner whose title you could not take from him except under this suit that is provided here; so that there is not only no necessity for it, but it would not, I think, be logical to accept that sort of an amendment, though I do not object.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for one minute, so that he may reply to a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. How, if the gentleman knows, would anyone desiring to initiate a preference right to land the entry to which is in default, and that subject to cancellation, proceed if there is no right of contest?

Mr. MONDELL. There is no way to proceed.

Mr. NORTON. No way to initiate a preference right?

Mr. MONDELL. You must simply wait until the entry is clear.

Mr. NORTON. I think the gentleman is somewhat in error as to the present law and practice.

Mr. MONDELL. No; I am not. I will say to my friend I happen to know about this particular thing. There can be no preference right established until after the entry has been canceled and the land restored to entry.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 22, after the word "fund," insert the words "but no homestead entry shall be subject to contest because of such arrears."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand the desire of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] to have this bill passed and to expedite its passage, but I do not know that that should incline him to accept amendments that are without rhyme or reason and that simply confuse the statute.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It does not do any harm.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it always does harm to put into a statute something that will require interpretation, when there is no logical interpretation to be put upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. MANN. Just a word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] why he did not move to strike out that language in section 3? Because, of course, it leaves it open to future construction, and no one can tell how it will be construed.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Because section 3 refers to entry. It is a provision with regard to entry, and, therefore, while I think it is entirely superfluous, it is entirely logical. This has no reference to entry.

Mr. NORTON. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I have the floor. Let me read the language and get it into the RECORD, and gentlemen can quarrel about it afterwards. Under the head of "Construction charge," in section 3, the one provision says:

And if he be a homestead entryman his entry also shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund, but no homestead entry shall be subject to contest because of such default.

The other reads:

And if he be a homestead entryman his entry also shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund.

If there ever were two things on earth on all fours and just alike, these two are.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. My distinguished friend from Wyoming ought either to concede the propriety of this amendment or else ask unanimous consent to return to section 3 for the purpose of striking out the sentence there.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know that it is particularly material whether we do or do not adopt illogical amendments that will have no effect, but when the gentleman says this is a logical proposition, because when you are referring to an entry and to the payment on the entry and to the right under the entry you prohibit contests; therefore it is logical when you are legislating about a maintenance charge, which applies not only to entries but to land in private ownership, to lands that have not as yet applied for water, to adopt a similar amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would not contend that language in regard to a homestead entryman and his entry, and so forth, would apply to land in private ownership, or apply to the homesteader if he had obtained a patent for his land.

Mr. MONDELL. No; but the provision is a provision not with regard to homesteads but with regard to a maintenance charge. It has nothing to do with the other. Of course, we do not want anyone to have the right to contest under this section, but that right does not now exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECLAMATION REQUIREMENTS.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make rules and regulations governing the irrigation of the lands within any project, and may require the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of one-fourth the irrigable area under each water-right application or entry within three full irrigation seasons after the filing of water-right application or entry, and the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of one-half the irrigable area within five full irrigation seasons after the filing of the water-right application or entry, and shall provide for continued compliance with such requirements. Failure on the part of any water-right applicant or entryman to comply with such requirements shall render his application or entry subject to cancellation.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

On page 7, line 16, after the word "make," insert the word "general."

In line 17, after the word "the," insert the words "use of water in the."

Line 19, after the word 'of," strike out "one-fourth" and insert "one-half."

Page 7, line 12, strike out the word "one-half" and insert "three-fourths."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

WATER SERVICE.

SEC. 11. That whenever water is available and it is impracticable to apportion operation and maintenance charges as provided in section 5 of this act, the Secretary of the Interior may, prior to giving public notice of the construction charge per acre upon land under any project, furnish water to any entryman or private landowner thereunder until such notice is given, making a reasonable charge therefor, and such charges shall be subject to the same penalties and to the provisions for cancellation and collection as herein provided for other operation and maintenance charges.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that there should be an amendment to this section, on line 16, after the word "thereunder." It was taken up and thoroughly considered by the committee, and my recollection is that it was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say on behalf of the committee that I do not recall any such agreement.

Mr. RAKER. The point is that no entryman or landholder holding more than 160 acres should have the water right for more than 160 acres. In other words, he should not be permitted to hold 500 acres or 1,000 acres of land, with the right to have it irrigated.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, I think I can give him some information. In the House bill the language was inserted after the word "thereunder" "for not to exceed 160 acres."

Mr. RAKER. It was taken up and discussed in the committee, and my understanding was that it was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. It never was a committee amendment to the House bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman may remember that after the Senate bill was referred to the House Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands we had a hearing, at which Mr. Burgess, of El Paso, Tex., appeared before the committee and objected to that language. He contended that there were conditions prevailing in certain parts of the country, and particularly under the El Paso project, where it would work an injustice. We talked it over and agreed to leave that language out.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. My recollection is that after some discussion of that matter it was concluded on the part of some gentlemen who discussed the matter that these words in section 5 of the reclamation law still controlled:

No right to the use of water for land in private ownership shall be allowed for exceeding 160 acres to any one landowner.

Mr. RAKER. That would not control. I might be mistaken, but I know it was in the original House bill, and there are many reasons in my mind why it should be in this bill. The only objection that can be made against the Reclamation Service, and that is being corrected, is that large tracts of land are held by private individuals when they agreed to sell them. Now, we are disposing of the balance, and we now permit the individuals holding large tracts of land and direct the Secretary of the Interior to furnish them water for that land, not 160 acres, but it may be 500 or 1,000 acres.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We thought section 13 of the bill was sufficient to care for that matter and let it go at that.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman thinks that is already covered in the bill I shall offer no amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

ADMISSION OF PRIVATE LANDOWNERS TO NEW PROJECTS.

SEC. 12. That before any contract is let or work begun for the construction of any reclamation project hereafter adopted the Secretary of the Interior shall require the owners of private lands thereunder to agree to dispose of all lands in excess of the area which he shall deem sufficient for the support of a family upon the land in question, upon such terms and at not to exceed such price as the Secretary of the Interior may designate; and if any landowner shall refuse to agree to the requirements fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, his land shall not be included within the project if adopted for construction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how it is printed in the Senate engrossed bill, but in this print in the words "Secretary of the Interior" the word "Interior" begins with a small "i," in line 18. I ask unanimous consent that the word be capitalized.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That all entries under reclamation projects containing more than one farm unit shall be reduced in area and conformed to a single farm unit within two years after making proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation, or within two years after the issuance of a farm-unit plat for the project, if the same issues subsequent to the making of such proof: Provided, That such proof is made within four years from the date as announced by the Secretary of the Interior that water is available for delivery to the land. Any entryman failing within the period herein provided to dispose of the excess of his entry above one farm unit, in the manner provided by law, and to conform his entry to a single farm unit shall render his entry subject to cancellation as to the excess above one farm unit: Provided, That upon compliance with the provisions of law such entryman shall be entitled to receive a patent for that part of his entry which conforms to one farm unit as established for the project: Provided further, That no person shall hold by assignment more than one farm unit prior to final payment of all charges for all the land held by him subject to the reclamation law, except operation and maintenance charges not then due.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 10, line 18, after the word "delivery" strike out the word "to" and insert the word "for."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the district court of the United States for the district where the lands or some portion of the lands included within any reclamation project are situated shall have jurisdiction of all suits brought by the United States or the Secretary of the Interior for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and jurisdiction of all suits now pending or which may be hereafter instituted by any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district in behalf of the water users and settlers thereon for the enforcement of the provisions of this act and of the provisions of the reclamation law as referred to and defined in section 1 of this act.

The committee amendment was to strike out all of section 16.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the proposed amendment, being opposed to the amendment of the committee, and would like to proceed for 20 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Could not the gentleman reduce that somewhat?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have consumed no time whatever since this bill has been under consideration. I stated when the general debate began that I would not consume any time, with the understanding that under the five-minute rule I might have some time to discuss this particular part of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is understood by those in charge of the bill that the gentleman from South Dakota was to have some time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I might have taken this time by piecemeal on different sections by motions to strike out the last word and consumed much more time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have no desire to cut off reasonable time for debate, but I desire to offer an amendment to section 16, which I would like to have pending. I will ask that section 16 be disposed of, and then I will offer my amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman wants to offer an amendment as a new section?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why not offer it; he does not have to have it numbered?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to have section 16 stricken out first.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But I want section 16 to remain in the bill. I am opposed to the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, very well.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if it will inconvenience him if we dispose of this matter first?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it will not; but I would like to try and get an early adjournment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, before I begin I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, as I desire to elaborate somewhat on other portions of the bill in addition to discussing this particular section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TOWNSEND). The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, before discussing the amendment of the committee to strike out section 16 of the Senate bill I want to talk for a few minutes on the bill as a whole.

The hearings disclose that on most of the reclamation projects the settlers, in their efforts to make the necessary improvements on the land and keep up their payments to the Government, have exhausted their resources and find themselves unable to continue the 10 per cent annual payments and continue their improvements without borrowing money, and it is difficult to obtain loans on the lands except at very high rates of interest—rates that are practically prohibitive.

The bill divides settlers on irrigation projects into two classes: First, those who are yet to come; those who are to file homestead entries and water-right applications upon those projects where there are Government lands and private lands which have not yet come under the provisions and conditions of the reclamation law. The second class comprises those who are already on the land either as homestead entrymen or as landowners whose lands are subject to the provisions of the reclamation law. It might appear that this bill was prompted in the interests of the settlers and water users that come within the second class affected by its provisions. Naturally we are more apt to be concerned for the interests of those directly involved rather than because of the interests of those who may come after. I think, however, that it can not be said that this bill was principally intended to affect and relieve those that have undertaken to acquire homes in the arid sections of the country and comply with the requirements of the homestead law and meet their payments required under the existing reclamation law.

I make this statement because I believe that more good will come to those who have not yet made homestead entries or water-right applications within any reclamation project than the benefit that will inure to those that have made entries. I also think that the effect of the passage of this bill will be to stimulate and encourage settlers to undertake acquiring homes under the reclamation law. Conditions will be more inviting, more reasonable, and more possible to comply with than the conditions in the law as it stands at present.

I happened to be a Member of the House and a member of the Committee on the Public Lands in the Fifty-sixth Congress when the subject of reclamation was first considered, and there were many hearings and numerous discussions before and in this committee at that time with relation to the enactment of some law that would mean the reclaiming of the arid lands throughout the West and provide homes for those who might be ambitious to acquire homes for themselves and thereby better their condition and also aid in developing the country by adding to its wealth. As is usual with those who are intensely and deeply interested in any subject, those who were urging the legislation were more or less optimistic in their views, and represented that in their opinion a law that would divide the cost of reclamation into 10 annual payments without interest could be complied with by the settler without incurring any hardship or embarrassment upon him.

It was not until the Fifty-seventh Congress that the reclamation law was enacted, and it has now been upon the statute books for about 12 years. While it has not worked out as satisfactorily from any standpoint as its friends and advocates predicted, it has accomplished a great deal and enough to justify the wisdom of its enactment. Everyone realizes that there has been a great advance in the cost of all kinds of building material during the past 13 years, and that labor has also greatly increased in cost, and this has resulted in materially increasing the cost of construction of reclamation projects over what they were originally estimated to cost, and, consequently, the cost to the water user or the settler has been considerably more than he expected or anticipated when he made his entry and water-right application.

The same is true as to maintenance. There may be cause for criticism of extravagances on the part of the service, but no more than might be expected where large sums of public moneys are being expended by a governmental bureau or department without the supervision of Congress; and I think one of the mistakes of the reclamation law was because annual apropriations were not required upon estimates submitted to Congress, as appropriations are usually made in connection with the Government in all its branches. I believe it would have been better for the service—I mean the Bureau of Reclamation—if it had been required to come to Congress for appropriations each year. In any event, it is better administration from every standpoint, and it would save the service from much criticism if a check could be had upon expenditures, as would be the case if Congress was called upon annually to make the appropriations.

To come back to the pending bill and its advantages over the law as it now exists, so far as the settler or water user is concerned, I want to say that the provision dividing the cost of reclamation into 20 annual installments is not only wise but, I believe, necessary, if the reclamation act is to work successfully and accomplish what its friends hope for. It can not be expected that when a person settles in a country with which he is not familiar, coming perhaps from a humid section to an arid region, that he can prosper from the beginning, even under the most favorable conditions. To expect one to do so where he goes upon land perhaps covered with sagebrush, that has to be first cleared and then leveled after it is put in cultivation, considering the great expense attached thereto, in addition to building a house and a barn and the other things essential to a farm, to be required to pay one-tenth of the reclamation cost of his land, including maintenance, each year, is certainly unreasonable, and an experienced, thinking man would hardly undertake it. The wonder is that so many of those who have gone upon the different reclamation projects of the country have survived, as so many of them have.

The proposed change in existing law that extends the time of payment to 20 years and requiring an initial payment at the time of making the application for entry of 5 per cent of the total cost is all right. The allowance of a period of 4 years before a further payment is required is not only reasonable but wise, in my opinion. I believe if a settler makes the initial payment of 5 per cent and survives the 4 years following that he can then meet his installments annually, the first five being 5 per cent and the next ten 7 per cent each. The hearings disclose the reason for requiring no payment for the first five years, except the initial payment, and as stated, it is to enable the newcomer to utilize the returns from the land in further improvements upon the land, instead of requiring him to exhaust his resources each year in payments to the Government, as has been the case heretofore, and further, because, it is rightly asserted, that the first five years are years of very meager return, because of the necessity of preparing the land for proper irrigation and to get the soil in a condition to make it productive, which requires a few years of cultivation and preparation to make it produce to its highest capacity.

I am not in sympathy with those who are declaring that there should be an interest charge in connection with the deferred payments under the reclamation act, or as proposed by the pending bill; to require the settler to pay interest would not only be an added hardship to the burdens that he already has to bear, but in effect it would destroy, I am afraid, the benefits sought to be acquired by the change in the law. This is not a proposition of the Government loaning money without interest, and those who endeavor to create the impression that it is are not only unfair, but, in my opinion, are seeking to defeat the legislation. The reclamation act provides that the proceeds received from the sale of public lands shall be used for the purpose of reclaiming the arid lands of the country, and the benefit to the country is sufficient to justify the use of the money without interest in the added wealth that it brings to the Nation, which is beneficial to all of the people and the Nation as a whole.

There were those when the original homestead act was first suggested, and when that beneficent law was enacted, who opposed it on the grounds that it was unconstitutional to give away the public domain, and yet where is there anywhere a person who will say that the homestead law was not a wise measure and that its enactment has not been justified ten thousandfold? Where would this country be to-day without the homestead law? What would there be throughout the great West had that law not been enacted? I suppose our theoretical conservation friends would say that it would have been better for our posterity had the Government been less generous in the disposition of the public domain, and who assert that all of our natural resources should have been conserved and disposed of under restrictions that would have retarded the development of the country and made what has been accomplished throughout the West impossible.

Mr. Chairman, I rose to discuss this amendment that proposes to strike from the bill section 16, and having confidence, as I have, in the members of the committee that reported the bill, and having the utmost confidence in their conserving and protecting the rights and the interests of the water user, I am at a loss to understand why they have reported the amendment striking section 16 out of the bill. I am of the opinion that they were influenced in their action by yielding to the wishes of the Reclamation Service, who did not wish this provision to become a part of the law. I am going to discuss briefly why section 16 should not be stricken from the bill, and in doing so I want to speak particularly of conditions as they obtain within the Belle Fourche irrigation project in South Dakota, which presents ample justification for the Senate having made it a part of the measure.

At the time the construction of the Bellefourche project was under contemplation by the Secretary of the Interior there were approximately in private ownership something over 40,000 acres of the 100,000 acres of lands included in said project. The representatives of the Reclamation Service represented that before said project could be undertaken the owners of said private lands would have to cooperate with the department to the extent of incorporating and placing their lands in said project and agreeing to take water for the purpose of irrigating their lands from said project. The officials of the Reclamation Service represented to the private landowners that the entire cost of the construction of the completed works, including their maintenance and operation for a period of 10 years after completion, would not be to exceed the sum of $34 per acre, to be paid in 10 annual payments, at the rate of $3.40 per year. Sixty thousand acres of the lands included in the project were public and unappropriated, of an arid character, which the Reclamation Service was desirous of reclaiming; and in order to make the project feasible it was necessary that the private landowners should participate in the construction, operation, and maintenance of the project. Representations were made by representatives and agents of the Reclamation Service upon numerous occasions, and mass meetings were held by the private landowners for the purpose of considering the advisability of entering into an arrangement and aiding and participating in the construction and promotion of the project.

The private landowners were men with families, generally prosperous, engaged in stock raising, and were using their lands profitably, and it was with some hesitancy that they finally consented to enter into an arrangement to include their holdings in the reclamation project. Before doing so, and not being satisfied with the verbal representations and statements made by those representing the Reclamation Service, they required a written statement with reference to the proposed project, its cost, both for construction, operation, and maintenance, the time when it would be completed, and when they would be required to make their annual payments.

In response to this demand they were furnished with a circular entitled "The Bellefourche project, a part of the great Government scheme of irrigation, under an act of Congress approved June 17, 1902." This was signed by the Reclamation Service by Raymond F. Walter, engineer, he being in active charge of said proposed project. In the circular issued by Mr. Walter was the following question, propounded by the landowners:

> Q. How much will it cost to put water on 160 acres of land?—A. The cost will not exceed $3.40 per acre per year for 10 years, and may be as low as $2.25 per acre per year, if landowners subscribe for water to the full amount of their holdings and the water supply be sufficient. For 160 acres, therefore, the cost would be $544 per year at the maximum figure or $360 per year at the minimum figure.

It is claimed that the statements and representations contained in this circular were also ratified and approved by C. J. Blanchard, who was at the time statistician of the Reclamation Service and who at that time—1904—it is said, made a house-to-house canvass, interviewing private landowners upon said proposed project and trying to induce them to enter into the same, and discussing the details at length as to the cost of construction, operation, and maintenance, and the great advantage they would derive by participating in the project.

The private landowners were required to incorporate, and a company was organized with a capital stock of $3,400,000, divided into 100,000 shares, with a par value of $34 each, that being the outside estimated cost of the construction and of the operation and maintenance for 10 years of the said project, the estimates having been made by the Reclamation Service in accordance with the act of June 17, 1902. While $34 per acre was the outside estimated cost, it was represented by the representatives of the Reclamation Service that the cost of construction, including cost of operating and maintenance, for a period of 10 years, would probably not exceed $22.50 per acre. It was further represented that the project would be completed within two or three years after the commencement thereof—about the year 1907. Payments were not to begin until the project was completed. It has not yet been completed, but in 1907 an assessment for 1908 of $3.40 per acre was levied against about 12,000 acres of land under said project, and assessments were levied for subsequent years on the 12,000 acres and other lands within the units that were said to be completed.

The water users complain that the outside estimate of cost of the project has been exceeded in an amount of about $78,000 as to the operation and maintenance charge, and that this amount should not be so charged. Notwithstanding the protest of the water users and an alleged violation of the representations made by the Reclamation Service, an assessment was levied for the year 1911 of $3.60 an acre. That because the water users refused to pay this charge they were notified by the Reclamation Service on July 1, 1913, that unless they paid the charge water for irrigating purposes would be shut off on July 21. This was a critical time, as the shutting off of the water at that particular season would mean the destruction of crops, and it was a serious situation. The water users, believing that they were being wronged, caused to be instituted a proceeding for the issuance of a temporary injunction restraining the officials of the Reclamation Service from cutting off the water and enjoining them from collecting any charge until the final completion of the project. This action was instituted in the State court, and upon the motion and application of the defendants, who were officials or agents of the Reclamation Service, it was transferred to the United States district court for the district of South Dakota.

The amendment proposed by the committee to the bill of the Senate is to strike out section 16, which proposes to give to the courts jurisdiction to determine just such questions as are involved in this litigation. The only excuse, the only explanation that I can imagine why the committee consented to report this amendment is because one of the representatives of the Reclamation Service appeared before the committee and urged it to do so. He was summoned from Denver. The Reclamation Service spares no expense when any legislation is proposed affecting the service, and will bring its representatives from any part of the United States in order to prevent legislation that the service does not desire to have enacted. The water users are not so well situated. They were unable to send representatives here, and if I read correctly what the representative of the service stated to the committee, he endeavored to give the committee the impression that there is sufficient remedy under the law as it now exists, and that the legislation is not necessary to give the courts jurisdiction.

When this suit at Bellefourche was commenced and was transferred to the United States court a demurrer was filed on the part of the Government, the United States district attorney representing the Reclamation Service; and he plead want of jurisdiction and stated that the courts had no jurisdiction; and I quote from the brief that has been filed by the attorneys for the United States for the purpose of showing their position when presenting their contention to the court. I read from the brief, as follows:

> That the corporation plaintiff is not the proper plaintiff to claim or to receive the interlocutory injunctive relief granted by the lower court.
> That the judiciary can not interfere by injunction with the exercise of proper governmental functions of a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States, to wit, the executive branch thereof, as to the acts of the officers of the executive branch not uniawful nor ministerial, but requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of its officers. Defendants assert that the matters complained of in the amended bill are within the exclusive control of the executive department of the Government, free from the control of the courts.
> That this action is a suit against the United States to compel specific performance of this contract by enjoining the breach thereof.
> That the United States district court was without jurisdiction to give the interlocutory relief appealed from.

We find them, when they get into court, stating that the courts have no jurisdiction, maintaining that this function ought to be in the executive or administrative department of the Government. What does that mean? It means that the representatives of the Reclamation Service go out into the country, as they did in connection with this reclamation project at Bellefourche, when they induced people who owned half the land they wanted to consent that they might begin construction of a reclamation project there; and they induced them to relinquish their riparian rights to the water of the Bellefourche River and surrender their lands and agree that they would reduce their holdings to not more than 160 acres each, that being the farm unit in that project.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. For a brief question.

Mr. RAKER. Have all these private owners reduced their holdings to 160 acres?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I believe that they have two years within which to do that after the project is completed.

Mr. RAKER. They have not done it up to the present time?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. So far as I know, I do not think they have.

Mr. RAKER. Is it the gentleman's contention, now, the reason he wants this legislation, on the ground that the Government officials misrepresented to these people what should be taken, and, therefore, they are going into court to be relieved from this?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want these water users to have the right to go into court and have their rights adjudicated. They claim that expenses are being charged to this project that ought not to be charged. Some of the charges may be the extravagances that the gentleman from Illinois and some others have referred to in connection with reclamation projects generally. They have increased the annual maintenance cost per acre over and above what they assured and contracted the rate would be, and when the water users refuse to pay these excessive charges and go into court, they say that the courts have no jurisdiction, and it is for the Reclamation Service to determine whether or not they are violating their own contract.

Mr. RAKER. Some contention was made as to the charge of maintenance and operation in the same suit. Is it not a fact that all of these people had the opportunity to have that question fairly and squarely settled, and it was decided by the Supreme Court that they must pay their proportion of the cost of operation and maintenance?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that it was not so decided. This case has not yet reached the Supreme Court.

Mr. RAKER. Not this case, but all of the other cases.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. One case went to the Supreme Court involving the question of what the Reclamation Service might do in view of the law which apparently gives them latitude to do most anything they want to do. I believe it was the case of Baker v. Swigart. It is my contention that the Government of the United States, through the Bureau of Reclamation, ought to be required to live up to its contract just the same as the water users are required to live up to their contract, and when there are questions involving their property rights such questions ought to be determined by a judicial tribunal, and not by the department that makes the contract on the part of the Government. For the purpose of showing what the Belle Fourche water users complained of that caused them to go into court, I want to read an extract from the affidavit made by one O. E. Farnham that was filed in the court. It reads as follows:

> Threatening to cancel all water-right applications of the stockholders and members unless the demand for the payment of all operation and maintenance charges, together with all penalties, are paid, and that the amount demanded was unjust and illegal and was an attempt on the part of the representatives of the Government to coerce the water users into paying charges, if not illegal, that might very properly be questioned; that other measures of duress were resorted to, including the shutting off of the water supply, forfeiting all payments previously made (when the rights were attached to lands owned absolutely in private ownership), canceling homestead entries, and adding penalties of from 1 cent per acre to 5 cents per acre per month.

It would certainly seem that there is enough in that affidavit to demonstrate the wisdom of the Senate putting section 16 in the bill, and again I want to say I can not understand why the committee proposed striking it out, unless they were more desirous of pleasing the Reclamation Service than they were the water users, whose rights ought to govern in a matter so vital to their interests.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. POST. Has the court passed on the merits of the demurrer?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the judge of the United States district court of South Dakota overruled the demurrer. The case is now on appeal before the circuit court of appeals at St. Louis and the attorneys for the Government are there contending that the district court did not have jurisdiction. This bill proposes to fix the jurisdiction and settle it beyond all question, and it seems to me we ought to do that.

Mr. POST. As a lawyer does the gentleman think there is merit in the demurrer filed?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that I am inclined to think, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court referred to by the gentleman from California, that there may be something in the demurrer. The Belle-f urche water users raised the question of vested rights, and in the brief filed by the Government commenting upon this question the attorneys say:

> The homesteader has no vested rights against the Government. His position is one of grace and not of right.
> Private landholders are permitted "bounty of a generous Government" for the reclamation primarily, at the public expense of their private land.

I presume very few homesteaders now upon some reclamation project would appreciate the sentiment if told their position is one of grace, and private landowners would hardly submit that they are enjoying the "bounty of a generous Government."

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that in this case the people who owned 50,000 acres, or about one-half of the land that was subsequently included in the Bellefourche project, who were enjoying the use of it, had the rights of water appropriated from the river and who surrendered all of their rights, that they have rights that ought not to be disregarded or disposed of by the Reclamation Service, with whom they made their contract.

The whole trouble with the Reclamation Service, in my opinion, is that there is too much jurisdiction and too much power in the service itself. There ought to be some tribunal that could be appealed to finally when they feel that they are being wronged and deprived of their vested rights. As I have already stated, I think Congress made a mistake in providing in the law that the proceeds from the sale of the public domain should be available for expenditure by the Reclamation Service without annual estimates and appropriations being made. Had the law required this Congress could have kept fully informed on what was being done in the way of construction of projects, and kept a check on the expenditures. It would not have done any harm for Congress to have known what was going on, and the fund would not have been exhausted, as it was, and it would not have been necessary to issue bonds for the purpose of replenishing the fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I do hope that if this committee does not see fit to disagree to the recommendation of the committee striking out section 16 that the bill will go to conference and that the conferees will see to it that the section will remain in the bill, or one that will give the courts jurisdiction in cases such as the one that is now pending affecting the Belle Fourche water users. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, so that the committee might know the exact facts the record shows that there are 100,000 acres of land in private ownership; when it was started only 44,000 acres were in public ownership, so that the contention of misrepresenting and deceiving the owners of privately owned lands must be very weak, indeed. I am for the committee amendment, which strikes out section 16 of the Senate bill. But the question now is that there is a suit pending, and the parties are desiring to have special legislation in regard to that particular suit. This amendment was not considered by the committee of the Senate; it was simply placed in on the floor of the Senate after practically but little discussion, and it practically changes the policy of the Government in relation to these matters. The case I spoke of a moment ago is the case of Sweigert against Baker, wherein there was a contention that the homesteader and this privately owned land must not pay for the upkeep and the maintenance and operation of the ditches. They then contended as now that there would be no opportunity for a hearing, and this case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and after an elaborate argument and reargument the Supreme Court finally decided that the homesteader and water user must pay for operation and maintenance, and it was provided for under the reclamation law, that therefore they should pay for operation and maintenance of these projects, and the Government should not be responsible for many hundred thousand dollars—even running into the millions—for the purpose of operating and maintaining these reservoirs, ditches, and works for the privately owned land and the entrymen, and that has been one contention and one reason why some of our eastern friends think that the people in the West were trying to get out of paying the actual cost and all expense back to the Government. But a few men are always ready to reject and avoid legitimate or certain expenses——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Just after I conclude this sentence I will yield. But they agreed to pay back the cost of constructing the dams and reservoirs but they did insist, most of them, against the proposition of paying for the maintenance and operation pending the absolute completion, before the works are turned over to them by the Government. Now, here comes this special legislation which intends to change the law governing litigation in the United States courts by a special act. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to ask the gentleman if he will state to this committee that he is not in favor of giving the courts jurisdiction in regard to this law?

Mr. RAKER. I want to answer——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. RAKER. I will answer the question by saying that until it is determined that the present statutes are not sufficient to give every man an opportunity to obtain redress in court I would not be in favor of amending the bill by putting on special legislation in regard to conferring special jurisdiction upon the courts, and giving one particular case a standing in court where some attorney may have some doubt upon the matter.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman it is not a question of amending the bill; it is a question of striking out of the bill the provision that was in it when it passed the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; that is not the status of it. It was put on in the Senate without any discussion by the Senate committee. Along in the last moments of its consideration, the fervid presentation of it in a few moments by the Senator from the State in which this project was located caused it to be placed upon the bill. This provision has not been considered by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary or the House Committee on the Judiciary; but you ask to put it on a special bill conferring jurisdiction or taking away jurisdiction from the Federal courts in relation to a particular subject without such due and orderly consideration as is given to legislation on a question that is so vital as this.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It occurs to me it is rather unusual for a gentleman on the floor of the House to criticize and question a provision in a bill that comes from another body and then state it has not had consideration.

Mr. RAKER. Well, I have a right to read the RECORD, and from the RECORD it shows that the matter was not on the bill as the committee reported it, but it was placed on the bill after it was in the Senate. And I call the gentleman's attention particularly to the fact that practically all of the western Representatives, both Senators and Members of the House, appeared repeatedly for counsel at the Secretary of the Interior's office, with all the assistants that were needed, and this bill was thrashed out, this subject was brought before the committee, and my recollection is that in the discussion down there it received a vote or two by those present.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, that being the case, and it being special legislation, so extended in its character, so special in its character——

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER (continuing). With the reasons that are presented against it, it ought not to pass. The Secretary of the Interior has gone over the matter, as well as the attorney for the Reclamation Service, Judge King—and no one can question his ability and learning, and he is anxious to help these reclamation projects—and he believes it would be injurious to the Government and to the reclamation projects. And as to this particular case—let us dwell on that—he thinks we should not overturn the legislation now on the statute books in regard to the jurisdiction of the court for one special project.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Why does the gentleman from California call it special legislation?

Mr. RAKER. Simply because, so far as my information goes, I have found only one project and one suit involved, and that is the one in relation to the Belle Fourche project.

Mr. FALCONER. As I understand section 16, it simply provides taking away the hearings and the proceedings from the department here and having them in the particular State or district of the State where these projects exist. That is the gist of section 16. What is the objection to that proposition?

Mr. RAKER. We are not so sure about that. But even if that were true, there are, including Texas, some 18 land States. Now, the district courts might decide upon these things differently, and the result would be that eventually some one would take a case to the Supreme Court for adjudication. Why do we want that condition? Now, as to the statement made by my friend in regard to the representations. There has not been a contract shown, and is it possible we are now going to open up the field and provide by legislation the means by which an imaginary grievance can be aired in the courts? And you can say that the representations of Smith and Brown and Jones, who claim to represent the Department of the Interior and the Reclamation Service, are binding upon the Government, and that you are going to force them into court after 8 or 10 years of service. Full hearing has been had on all these matters by the Secretary of the Interior. In this particular case 100,000 acres of public land are in this project and only 40,000 in the public domain. How many homesteads have been filed? Who has been deceived?

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not now. It is not a question of going into court. It is a question of trying to divide the money out of the money they have expended, and the decision in this case of Swigert against Baker was one of the most righteous decisions ever rendered in behalf of this Government or in behalf of the reclamation project, that these men who went on there, doing what they were doing, ought not at this late day to say, "We are not responsible for what the Secretary of the Interior did or what the Director of the Reclamation Service did; we want our money back, and do not want to pay it," because Jones or Brown or some other irresponsible man, who could not bind the Secretary of the Interior or the Reclamation Service, might in his enthusiasm have made some statement that 90 per cent of the landowners on those tracts wanted them to make.

The Department of the Interior is of the opinion that this is not wise legislation upon this bill. Secretary LANE, in a note of March 27, 1914, to Hon. M. R. SMITH, chairman House Committee on Irrigation, states that—

Personally I see no reason for the adoption of the amendment.

He also transmits a memorandum from Judge Will R. King, who states that the proposed amendment is objectionable in the following particulars:

1. It will produce great confusion, as the United States district and appellate courts may have decisions wholly inconsistent, which must govern within their several jurisdictions until the Supreme Court has decided the specific question.

2. Any water users' association or irrigation district may bring suit and delay the application of necessary rules and regulations. In many such cases the Secretary must either refuse to furnish water or furnish it without payment for an indefinite period.

3. It confers no right on the United States that it does not now enjoy. The water users and water users' association have now the same rights of suit as other persons dealing with the department under the public-land laws

Many of the reclamation projects are interstate in character, the storage reservoir being in one State and the irrigated lands partly in the same and partly in another State. The proposed section 16, in the opinion of many familiar with this subject, will enable any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district, even though not directly connected with Government works, to greatly hamper the delivery of water and may produce far-reaching complications with added expense.

On this point I submit the following:

First. The plan proposed will produce an increased amount of litigation and involve the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice in considerable expense. It will enable the water users' associations or irrigation districts, whether connected with Government work or not, if so inclined, to hold up indefinitely the disposition of large areas of public land. This jurisdiction is conferred in the case of "any legally authorized association or irrigation district," these being titles frequently used by private enterprise.

Second. A promoter might organize a water users' association of his own, having no connection whatever with any Government project, and take advantage of this amendment to precipitate litigation in regard to water rights, rights of way through proposed reclamation reservoirs, irrigable Government lands, and so forth, and delay the Government work for years by injunction pendente lite and other embarrassments incidental to litigation. The speculator might take advantage of it to delay the Secretary in an enforcement of the provisions of the law in regard to residence and cultivation, and thus be enabled to continue his holding for a greater profit at the expense of the incoming settler.

Third. The amendment is not consonant with or in keeping with the United States judicial code or court decisions, but is a radical departure, hedged about with no restrictions. It gives the United States court jurisdiction of causes arising in the future between individual water users and the association and others.

Fourth. It confers no rights on the United States that it does not now enjoy.

Fifth. The water users now have a method of enforcing the law. Under the code and equity rules one or more settlers may sue on behalf of all concerned who are similarly situated; water users' associations represent all water users thereunder, and costs are apportioned against all; a few may wish to sue or be in a position to benefit by the suit, yet the association would be under obligations to bring these suits, however small or personal in their character.

Sixth. It permits any such organization, legally constituted under State law, to bring suit against the United States officials regarding water rights; makes many legal complications, and will entail large expense without compensating benefits.

Seventh. In the enforcement of the homestead laws under projects the general and the local land offices will be forced to follow decisions of United States courts in the various States which may be different in the various jurisdictions, and this department would thus be burdened with enforcing different constructions in different States.

Eighth. The amendment will greatly complicate the disposition of Government business and interfere with its dispatch. It is entirely foreign to the general purpose of the bill to which it is attached, and it will prevent the exercise by the Secretary of such discretion as the bill specifically vests in him.

Ninth. When it is realized that the reclamation projects are located in 17 different States, and some in 2 States, it will be appreciated that the resultant effect of the several district courts being called upon independently to interpret and pass upon contracts and regulations affecting the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, it is not reasonable to anticipate that there would be an agreement of decisions in the various courts. A regulation intended to be uniform for all projects could thus be held to be legal and proper on one project and invalid as to another; or, to have one effect on one project and another effect on another project, thus resulting in the engendering of animosities and rivalries as between the water users of the various projects, and confusion and conflict in the administration. Such conflict of decisions would necessarily compel delay until said decisions had been reconciled by the appellate courts on appeal, probably necessitating in some cases a decision of the United States Supreme Court. Such loss as would be so occasioned would fall upon the water users.

Tenth. It would seem inadvisable to legislate specially relative to jurisdiction of the United States courts in purported behalf of one class of citizens.

Eleventh. It is difficult to understand wherein section 16, if enacted, will aid the water users under any Government project. It would open the way for private corporations, contractors, and others, to embarrass the work of the Government, organizing under the name of a water-users' association or irrigation district, and through litigation professing to represent certain settlers or water users, add to the burden of the real water users.

Twelfth. It is easy to foresee the effect, if the several district courts independently interpret and pass upon contracts and regulations affecting the actions of the Secretary of the Interior, and it is distinctly inadvisable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I think debate has been exhausted. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has been on the floor about a dozen times.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. FALCONER. Can I have one minute?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Make it six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment close in six minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is true, as the gentleman from California has stated, that in the conferences had in the office of the Secretary of the Interior by western Members in connection with this bill, and in the consideration of the bill in the committee, a provision for appeal from the decisions of the Secretary of the Interior was discussed, and it was concluded it would not be practicable on this bill to provide for such an appeal.

That decision did not, however, reflect the views of all the gentlemen who participated in those discussions relative to the propriety and righteousness of such a provision, and I shall vote with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] against striking out this section, because I believe, and have long believed, that there is not a citizen under the flag who is not entitled to his day in court. I do not like the form of this provision placed in the bill in the Senate. If I were to draft a provision, it would be quite different. And yet this reaches the point.

Several years ago I introduced a bill which was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Public Lands providing for appeals from final decisions of the Secretary of the Interior in all cases relating to the land laws. I regret it did not become a law. It is not simply a question of the case of the constituents of our friend from South Dakota. This amendment involves the very much larger question as to whether these people and all others who are affected in their property and in their rights by decisions of the Secretary of the Interior shall finally have an opportunity to take their cases and their causes and their claims before a court. We all understand that it is not humanly possible for the Secretary's office under any possible organization to be entirely free from bias or prejudice in cases where the Secretary's office is the inquisitor, the prosecutor, the judge, and the jury. That is the situation in all land cases.

While this refers only to the reclamation entries and entrymen, a general provision covering all claimants before the Interior Department would be still better. I do not believe that it would be greatly confusing. I do not apprehend that the courts would hold that entrymen must not pay for proper expenditures on projects. No such outcome of these cases would be anticipated by me. But there are many questions arising on these projects between entrymen and claimants and the service in regard to which the entryman should have an opportunity to place his case before a court. We give all other American citizens whose rights are challenged, whose property is involved, an opportunity to present their case before a court, there to be calmly and judicially decided, and I know of no reason why it should not be done in cases of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I have had a number of communications from my State concerning section 16, and they all favor the section as it was put in by the Senate.

Objection has been made to it on the ground that if the section were adopted it would complicate matters, particularly where a project was interstate, or extend into one or more different States. But certainly there ought to be no objection to section 16 if it were amended to apply to projects all of which were within one State.

I want to ask the chairman of the committee if, in his opinion, there would be any objection to an amendment providing that section 16 should apply to these projects within a State?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Personally I would not say that I would object, but I have no authority on behalf of the committee to make any concessions. The committee considered it and had a full hearing of the reclamation people, and they felt it was entirely unnecessary. They felt that it was a special section put in there by the Senator from South Dakota to meet one particular case, and that it would have a tendency to complicate matters. It was held to be unnecessary, and it was suggested that if any such legislation was necessary we ought to take it up in a more systematic way than we have done. But personally I am not especially afraid of it.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I never have been able to understand why a man in the State of Washington, 3,000 miles to the west, should be obliged to carry his case to the Capital of the Nation, when there are United States district courts in that State. It is a burden that breaks the spirit of bona fide homesteaders—the costs are terrific.

Only to-day, sir, a constituent of mine came into my office, and in the course of conversation it developed that this is his third trip during the past two years. His sole business is in the endeavor to get title to a homestead on which he and his wife had lived, actual residence, for over five years.

He has his attorneys in the West and has also employed attorneys here at a good, substantial conditional fee. This is characteristic of land matters. While the question involved in section 16 is somewhat different from cases above referred to, yet, Mr. Chairman, when we consider the penalties of sections 3 and 6 as applying to defaulters, defaulting sometimes, no doubt, through conditions that can not be helped, it occurs to me that in view of the severity of these penalties, even going to the extent of a deficiency judgment, that a locator should have the advantage of the local United States courts. However, Mr. Chairman, I have had the matter up with the department, and I ask unanimous consent to insert certain correspondence from Director Newell and Secretary Lane.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1914.

Hon. J. A. FALCONER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FALCONER: Your letter of July 23 has been received regarding Senate bill 4628, in which you state that you hope there well be no opposition from this department to having section 16 restored to the bill.

The matter is one to which I have personally given little attention, as it is largely a legal proposition and one to which I understand the department is already opposed. Secretary Lane, in a note of March 27, 1914, to Hon. M. R. SMITH, chairman House Committee on Irrigation, states that, "Personally I see no reason for the adoption of the amendment." He also transmits a memorandum from Judge Will R. King, who states that the proposed amendment is objectionable in the following particulars:

"1. It will produce great confusion, as the United States district and appellate courts may have decisions wholly inconsistent which must govern within their several jurisdictions until the Supreme Court has decided the specific question.

"2. Any water users' association or irrigation district may bring suit and delay the application of necessary rules and regulations. In many such cases the Secretary must either refuse to furnish water or furnish it without payment for an indefinite period.

"3. It confers no right on the United States that it does not now enjoy. The water users and water users' association have now the same rights of suit as other persons dealing with the department under the public-land laws."

Many of the reclamation projects are interstate in character, the storage reservoir being in one State and the irrigated lands partly in the same and partly in another State. The proposed section 16, in the opinion of the legal men, will enable any "legally organized" water users' association or irrigation district, even though not directly connected with Government works, to greatly hamper the delivery of water, and may produce far-reaching complications with added expense.

On this point the accompanying memoranda have been prepared.

Cordially, yours,

F. H. NEWELL, Director.

MEMORANDA ON PROPOSED SECTION 16 OF S. 4628.

1. The plan proposed will produce an increased amount of litigation and involve the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice in considerable expense. It will enable the water users' associations or irrigation districts, whether connected with Government work or not, if so inclined, to hold up indefinitely the disposition of large areas of public land. This jurisdiction is conferred in the case of "any legally authorized association or irrigation district," these being titles frequently used by private enterprise.

2. The speculator might take advantage of it to delay the Secretary in an enforcement of the provisions of the law in regard to residence and cultivation, and thus be enabled to continue his holding for a greater profit at the expense of the incoming settler.

3. The amendment is not consonant with or in keeping with the United States judicial code or court decisions, but is a radical departure hedged about with no restrictions. It gives the United States court jurisdiction of causes arising in the future between individual water users and the association and others.

4. It confers no rights on the United States that it does not now enjoy.

5. The water users now have a method of enforcing the law. Under the code and equity rules one or more settlers may sue on behalf of all concerned who are similarly situated. Water users' associations represent all water users thereunder, and costs are apportioned against all. 6. It permits any such organization, legally constituted under State law, to bring suit against the United States officials regarding water rights, makes many legal complications, and will entail large expense without compensating benefits.

7. In the enforcement of the homestead laws under projects, the general and the local land offices will be forced to follow decisions of United States courts in the various States which may be different in the various jurisdictions, and this department would thus be burdened with enforcing different constructions in different States.

8. The amendment will greatly complicate the disposition of Government business, and interfere with its dispatch. It is entirely foreign to the general purpose of the bill to which it is attached, and it will prevent the exercise by the Secretary of such discretion as the bill specifically vests in him.

9. 10. Further, it would seem inadvisable to legislate specially relative to jurisdiction of the United States courts in purported behalf of one class of citizens.

11. It is difficult to understand wherein section 16, if enacted, will aid the water users under any Government project. It would open the way for private corporations, contractors, and others to embarrass the work of the Government, organizing under the name of a water users' association, or irrigation district, and through litigation, professing to represent certain settlers or water users, add to the burden of the real water user.

12. It is easy to foresee the effect if the several district courts independently interpret and pass upon contracts and regulations affecting the actions of the Secretary of the Interior, and it is distinctly inadvisable.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The amendment is to strike out section 16?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Those who wish to strike it out will vote "aye" and those opposed will vote "no."

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out section 16.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert in the bill a new section No. 16. Section 16 has been stricken out, and I move to insert as section 16 the amendment that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] offers an amendment for the purpose of inserting a new section 16. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 16. That from and after July 1, 1915, expenditures shall not be made for carrying out the purposes of the reclamation law except out of appropriations made annually by Congress therefor, and the Secretary of the Interior shall, for the fiscal year 1916 and annually thereafter, in the regular Book of Estimates submit to Congress estimates of the amount of money necessary to be expended for carrying out any or all of the purposes authorized by the reclamation law, including the extension and completion of existing projects and units thereof and the construction of new projects. The annual appropriations made hereunder by Congress for such purposes shall be paid out of the reclamation fund provided for by the reclamation law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a word to explain my amendment. Under the existing law the reclamation fund amounts, I am informed, to something like $80,000,000. There is in the law an annual appropriation that allows the Interior Department to expend this money as they see proper on such projects as they determine to expend it on.

I do not wish to criticize the bureau that has had this matter in charge. I have no doubt it is composed of good engineers, capable men, to plan and execute the projects. But they are natural enthusiasts in behalf of their work; otherwise they probably would not be good men for their places. They naturally want to expand as far as they can, and, more than that, there is of necessity a great deal of pressure that will come on them from political sources to expand the projects as far as possible.

Now, I think that under these circumstances the bureau has overreached itself and will continue to do so in the future. More than that, I think the bureau has at times entered upon projects that were unwise, and has expended more money on projects than conditions authorized or warranted. I do not believe it is wise for us to continue practically in the hands of one bureau—although I believe the Secretary of the Interior has the signing of the orders, but it is the bureau chief that directs the matter—the control of $80,000,000 to-day, a sum that in a few years will amount to $100,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Two hundred million dollars on these projects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At any rate, $100,000,000 at least. Now, this amendment simply does this: It does not destroy the integrity of the irrigation fund. It keeps it set apart as a separate fund, as it is to-day. It does not authorize its use for any other purpose, except for the irrigation purposes fixed under the law and in this bill; but it provides that instead of the annual appropriation law, which is repealed under the provisions of this amendment, the Secretary of the Interior shall submit to the Congress every year his estimates as to where this $80,000,000, or whatever the reclamation fund amounts to, shall be used, and then the Congress shall determine on what projects to use it. I think that is the proper place to lodge this authority and the place to use it.

Mr. FRENCH. Does the gentleman think the Congress could determine wisely upon the particular projects to be undertaken by the Government? Is not that a matter that ought to be left with the bureau which has charge of the work now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we conform to the gentleman's ideas, we ought to stop passing river and harbor bills and send down $50,000,000 every year to the engineers of the United States Army. If we conform to the gentleman's ideas, we ought to stop making specific appropriations for the Navy and send down a lump sum to the Secretary of the Navy to use as he sees fit. I do not know of any other place in the Government where a large sum is being left to the discretion of a bureau chief.

Now, to come right down to the question, I do not think for a moment that the Congress would act on this matter without being advised by the head of the bureau as to his judgment and opinion about the matter. The amendment I send to the Clerk's desk requires that the Interior Department, which in this case means the bureau chief, shall submit estimates as to where this money had best be expended, and I have no doubt that those estimates will largely govern the decision of Congress, but not necessarily so; and the only thing is that you gentlemen from the West, who control this $80,000,000, may be fighting over a small hog barrel of your own, and the balance of us sitting on a jury to determine where it shall go; but the disposition of the fund will be in responsible hands, in the Congress of the United States, in the place where it ought to be.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the very illustration used by the gentleman from Alabama in referring to the work of the Government in the improvement of our rivers and harbors, it seems to me, is a very pertinent suggestion that the policy which has been followed by the Government in the reclamation work of the past is better than that followed by the Government in connection with the improvement of rivers and harbors. No one can deny the fact that a very large sum of money appropriated by the Congress from year to year for the improvement of rivers and harbors is wasted, not on account of any weakness in the department that has to do with the expenditure of that money, but because of the fact that we do not have clearly defined a long distance ahead a system in the prosecution of which the money can be and should be expended. It seems to me we are going to have a weakness in that same connection if we attempt to make annual authorizations for the expenditure of money in the Reclamation Service.

Many river and harbor improvements will cost twice as much as they ought, twice as much as they would have cost if we had looked ahead and anticipated the work that should have been done on a particular river or harbor for a period of 8 or 10 years, and had then authorized the completion of that work and made an appropriation or authorization sufficient for it. And so it is with these projects. If the Reclamation Service must come to Congress every year to know whether or not every man who is at work with a grader grading a ditch, and every man who is at work with a shovel in the development of some particular part of an irrigation system must lay down his tools at the end of the fiscal year, and not know whether the work shall be continued, the western people who are interested in this subject will, in my opinion, be called upon to pay larger sums of money for the reclamation of their land than under the policy which we have been following in the past.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while possibly mistakes have been made, and necessarily, on account of the new character of the work which we have carried on, yet, at the same time under that policy, we have been able to look ahead over a period of several years, and, as I see it, do far better than under the policy that is suggested, in anticipating the expenses necessary on each and all of the projects, and, therefore, more wisely expend the money.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GORDON. How do you get around the provision of the Constitution which says that no money of the United States shall be spent except upon appropriations made annually by Congress?

Mr. MANN. There is no such provision in the Constitution.

Mr. GORDON. I supposed there was.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has inserted the word "annually." That is not in the Constitution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is only in relation to war expenses.

Mr. GORDON. I accept the amendment; but no money can be spent lawfully except what has been appropriated by Congress.

Mr. FRENCH. That is true; but, of course, in this law as it now is there is complete authority vested in the department to handle this money. My point is that the system that we have been following, and that I think ought to be followed in the future, enables the department the better to anticipate the moneys that it will have to expend and the places where it ought to be expended, and so bring down to the very minimum the cost of reclamation work on the various projects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see if I can get debate closed on this amendment. I should like to get it closed up this afternoon. I suggest that the amendment be voted on in 30 minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who is opposed to it, and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in 30 minutes, half of it to be controlled by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I should like some time on this.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not expect that everybody will get five minutes, but they can get leave to extend.

Mr. BRYAN. I feel that this is a matter of great importance, and I have views upon it, and I want to get five minutes if possible.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest that the debate on this amendment close in 40 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Probably I can get in within that time, if the committee will yield. I certainly am opposed to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Alabama who is to control the time in favor of the amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I do not care to control it, because I have made my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time for debate on this amendment shall be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should be agreed to. It will not place the appropriations for the Reclamation Service in the same position as other appropriations are, because the appropriations will still be payable out of the reclamation funds, which funds can not be used for any other purpose. This amendment is not subject to the criticism which will be leveled against it, which criticism will be that Congress may not make the appropriations, and that they will have to fight all the time for the appropriations.

This amendment does not change the law that the funds coming in from the sale of public lands, and so forth, are covered into the Treasury as a reclamation fund, and it can be used for no other purpose than for the Reclamation Service. All this amendment does, in effect, is to require the Reclamation Service to make this estimate in advance for the money it needs for various projects, make these public as they are submitted to Congress, then appear before the Appropriations Committee and give the reasons why they need the money for particular projects and submit to the action of Congress in making the appropriations.

There is no other service in the Government now that enjoys to any extent these permanent appropriations. Since the gentleman from Alabama and I have been Members of the House Congress has repealed nearly all the laws that made permanent appropriations, such as the law that provided for the collection of customs, which used to be a permanent appropriation; such as the law providing for the permanent appropriation for the Immigration Service, and various other permanent appropriations.

Now, what is the possible objection to giving Congress control over it? The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] compares tl.is with the river and harbor service, and says that no one will deny that in many places the river and harbor expenditures have been twice what they ought to be. Well, that is wild talk. The gentleman from Idaho is not informed as to the river and harbor projects anywhere in the United States. No such correct statement can be made. It is possible that we provide authorization for river and harbor improvement sometimes which might wait or which may not be profitable.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I have not the time. I think the gentleman made an incorrect statement, but I did not interrupt him because I knew he had not much time. There has never been any such extravagant expenditure, any such useless expenditure, any such wild expenditure, in the river and harbo. service as there has been in the Reclamation Service. Projects have been commenced which gentlemen admit by this bill are not profitable enough to pay interest. Projects have been commenced where the Government owned only a little land, and it was for the benefit of private owners of land. Take the Yakima case up here this morning, where in order to let the Government purchase—for that is what it was—the rights of private corporations they got the Secretary of the Interior—and that meant the Reclamation Service—to attempt to defraud the Indians and give them an excuse for paying the price for private enterprises.

Now, all these things ought to run the scrutiny of Congress. It should have the figures of the estimates; the estimates should be submitted in the open to the public, permitting criticism of these estimates in the House and in the Senate. There will not be much criticism of them, because when they are submitted in this way they will be carefully prepared, which they have not been in the past. The fund will not be lost gentlemen. The fund is there. It could not be used for any other purpose without a change of the law. But the fund, being there, will come under the scrutiny of the department, of the Secretary, above the chief of the service, and of the Congress, and it will lead to a far wiser use of the money than has been the rule in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is to be adopted, I am frank to say that its language is in good form, but it seems to me that the burden of proof is on those who are proposing to make the change. They ought to be able to demonstrate that there would be a saving in annual appropriations by Congress.

I seriously doubt that if the various expenditures made by the Reclamation Service during the past 12 years had been scrutinized by the Committee on Appropriations any saving would have been made. That committee would have done as all other committees do, taken the word of the department officials, and the appropriations would have been made that they asked for.

I know that Congress does not conduct its business in an efficient manner. If any corporation had a board of directors as inefficient as Congress it would become bankrupt in a year.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that the expenditures made by the Reclamation Service have been extravagant, wild, and useless.

The gentleman has made a most serious charge. In the heat of debate one may indulge in loose talk, but this is a case where the burden of proof is on him, and he should be able to demonstrate to the House that he knows what he is talking about. I want him to prove that there has been greater waste, greater extravagance, and less efficiency in the work done by the Reclamation Service than in similar Government work done under annual estimates and appropriations.

The Reclamation Service claims that there has been no greater number of errors and mistakes of judgment in their work than in similar enterprises by private contractors. We would expect this service to make such a claim and we can take it with a grain of salt, but I would rather believe this claim to be true than to imagine that they have been more extravagant in their expenditures than those who disburse the funds of the Government on rivers and harbors or on public buildings.

The cost of Government work is notoriously high. It is not necessary for me to stop here to prove this statement. Every Member of this House can recall instances that have come to his knowledge. We excuse this state of affairs by saying that the Government builds more substantial structures than the ordinary individual or corporation, and this excuse covers a multitude of sins.

I would like to read some testimony as to the work of the Reclamation Service by Mr. T. H. Corey, for many years one of the engineers of the Southern Pacific Railway system, who made this statement in the printed proceedings of the American Society of Civil Engineers in March, 1913:

> Nevertheless, based on a fairly complete knowledge of only the Salt River, Yuma, and Orland projects of the service, and the observation and study of data examined during eight years with the Harriman lines in California, Arizona, and Mexico—six years as a maintenance and operation official, with unusual opportunities to observe—the writer is convinced that in these three projects at least the Reclamation Service gets more actual work for a dollar than do the Harriman lines.

The unit costs of various types of work are given in the annual reports of the Reclamation Service. In the last printed report for the year ending June 30, 1913, on page 311, are given prices paid for moving earth. These range from less than 10 cents per yard under favorable conditions up to 20 cents per yard or over where the excavation is more difficult.

The yardage cost of moving earth is almost identical with that paid by the large transcontinental railroads who are building new lines of road in the same country.

For the next largest item of construction, loose rock or indurated material, the prices paid range from 17 cents per yard up to 50 cents, these prices being also practically identical and sometimes a little less than those paid by railroad companies.

I have a statement here which I shall put into the RECORD relative to the cost per million cubic feet of masonry construction in the United States, which shows that on the average the cost is $406, and the cost per million feet for work done by the Reclamation Service is $61.

I am not here to deny that there has been unjustifiable waste on the reclamation projects, but I am confident that the waste has been no greater than on similar enterprises undertaken by the Government.

We have the best check on this work in the farmers themselves—better than any Appropriations Committee. They have protested against extravagant expenditures on every project, but nobody listened to them at first. The Appropriations Committee would have dismissed them as a lot of kickers. Now we have a Secretary of the Interior who has listened, and I know that he will never approve of anything but the strictest economy and the highest efficiency on work done by the Reclamation Service.

There is no virtue in this amendment. It surely will mean delay, because Congress will not always be prompt in making the appropriations. In this very Congress we have been compelled to pass continuing resolutions because four great appropriation bills were not passed before the end of the fiscal year. Is this such a model of congressional efficiency that we can point to it with pride?

Let us look for a moment at the practical operation of this proposed change. An estimate will be sent to the Appropriations Committee, consisting of 21 estimable gentlemen, only 1 or 2 of whom have the slightest knowledge of irrigation; and later a bill will be reported to this House, consisting of 435 Members, of which 400 have never seen an irrigated acre.

It then becomes the duty of every Member from the arid West to see that his district is properly cared for in the bill. Eastern Members complain that their patience is wearied by the discussion of public-land bills, but just wait until the annual reclamation bill comes along. Then we will give you some field days of oratory on a subject in which you are even less interested.

It takes no great prophet to foretell what will happen when the bill goes to the Senate. I warn you here and now that the adoption of this amendment is but the inception of another pork barrel, and that before this scheme has been in operation five years you will see raids made on the Treasury for no other reason than that those who speak for the West in another body will be determined to get their share.

We had better let well enough alone. Now we have a fund that is limited by the receipts from the sale of public lands. This fund is apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior according to the feasibility of the projects. The only mistake ever made was in the authorization of too many projects, but under the original reclamation act the Secretary was required to distribute the funds among the States. It was soon realized that this was a mistaken policy, and in 1910 section 9 of the reclamation act was repealed. Since that time no project without merit has been authorized.

Will anyone deny that it is not better to let a department be responsible for the work and say where the money should be spent rather than leave this vital matter to the decision of Members of the House and Senate whose political lives depend on their ability to bring home the bacon to their districts and States.

The adoption of this amendment will lead to nothing but logrolling. Political pull and not merit will determine the projects to be constructed. Just as we now complain because money is wasted on shallow creeks and harbors without commerce, so will scandal come because expensive irrigation works are built where they can not be profitably used. The cry in river and harbor improvement is for a "policy, not a project," but the river and harbor bill still enumerates projects by the score, and the only policy in it is that each State shall get its share.

It has been seriously proposed that all of our river and harbor work be turned over to a commission with authority to expend a lump sum each year to the best advantage. I, for one, believe this to be a proper solution of this vexed problem. Certainly such a plan would relieve Congress of a vast amount of worry. Such a commisison would stand between the Congressman and his desire to get something for his district whether the improvement was legitimate or not. Certainly such a plan could work no worse than the present system.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can not yield at this time. Let me repeat that I am not here to defend any reckless expenditures heretofore made by the Reclamation Service. I admit that money has been wasted by this service on the various projects, as on all other Government work, but the question is whether, by bringing these appropriations to Congress, we will save any money. I can not see from what I have observed in my brief experience in this House that any economy will come from this change.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, my judgment may not be as good as that of some of the other Members of this House. Of course, it is not; but I do believe that if you pass this amendment you will cripple the Reclamation Service and deprive it of its greatest efficiency by requiring the officers of that service to come here and take up with the various committees and with the Members of this House the proposition of expending this money that is in this revolving fund—take up with men who do not know anything about the Reclamation Service, take up with a large body of men who are not acquainted with any of the problems and who will not study them, the question of how this money shall be spent. When you require that, it seems to me that you are going to decrease the efficiency of this service. We now have long sessions of Congress, and it has been suggested that we are not able to study these details, that we have not the time. If we add this reclamation appropriation bill, which it will amount to, to the details of Congress, we will have that much more to do, which we have not the time to perform. We have out there in those districts these various projects, and they have been successful. I did not ask for a release from the payment of interest, because of the charge that unusual estimates had been made, and lay the blame for that on the Reclamation Service. I do not believe they are to blame. Every time a project has been established those who naturally depend upon the service came and asked for an additional dam or for an improvement, and the price of labor and supplies went up, and of course the expenses increased, but the Reclamation Service stands as a monument to the efficiency of the Interior Department in the West, and a great success has been made. In one case, for instance, they are operating a coal mine; they are mining their own coal, and they are connecting it with a Government railroad out there; and they are doing things that if you were to come here to get permission of Congress to have done you never would get done.

Congress could not come to the point of considering the proposition, and when you submit that to the Committee on Appropriations and have that committee parcel out the money in the midst of a lot of other appropriations it will be found that men will have to use their patronage and ability to get something for each particular enterprise—something for their constituency. I hope that will not be done. I hope this work that has been carried on so efficiently in the past will be continued as it is and that Congress will not adopt this amendment. How embarrassing it will be for Members to fight the entire bill and to filibuster on it because their home project is not included. By compromises you will let in unworthy projects. The bill will be amended on the floor and in the Senate and in conference. No business enterprise could succeed if administered in that way, and this is a business enterprise.

In passing our Federal reserve bank bill we especially called attention to the fact that important matters were left in the hands of the department and were not placed in the hands of Congress because we did not want Congress to logroll on the locating of the banks and all of those things that would be pulled from place to place on account of politics. We gave to the President the right to expend $35,000,000 in Alaska on the Government railroad and left with him the matter of locating it, because we felt that it could be done better in that way by delegating that authority, and the time has come when Congress has got to delegate some of this authority, when we have to depend on some of the departments, and this Reclamation Service, where the money is to be paid back and is not to be appropriated in the pork-barrel methods that have obtained always in the river and harbor appropriations, is exactly the department where we ought to extend rather than withdraw the delegation of authority and the right to proceed without asking Congress every step that is to be taken. Take water-power permits in the West, for instance. If we required the Secretary of the Interior to come here every time a water power was to be established out there we would never get through, and we would never be able to adjourn. I think we ought not to abandon the policy that we have been following. The passage of this amendment will strike a death blow to efficiency in the Reclamation Service. The whole proposition would have gone by the board long ago if we had been compelled to come to Congress at every step. We ought not to mix up these executive details with legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I have in my district three or four of these reclamation projects, and up to this time I have not attempted to take one minute of the time of the committee, for I have been so anxious to have this measure get through in order that the people out there could get the relief to which they are entitled. As to this particular amendment, I am not going to attempt to discuss it, for I have not given it that thought which I would consider necessary in order to be able to discuss it intelligently, but at first blush I would be in favor of the amendment.

As I said, I have no idea of discussing this amendment. I want to touch on one or two things that have been brought out here, and that is that the people in favor of this bill and some of those who are against it have probably not been as considerate in their remarks as they should have been. There has been a great deal of abuse of the Reclamation Service, and there has been a great deal of abuse of the settlers who have gone on these projects. I was considerably impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], when they spoke of the lack of business methods that there were in connection with these projects, in not charging interest on the investment against these settlers, and the inconsistency of the settlers and their representatives in protesting against such a charge. I could not help but think, as I heard them, that if either one of those gentlemen had been placed in similar circumstances, had gone on the projects, and had a certain estimate given for cost, and that cost had exceeded from 50 to, in some cases, 300 per cent more than the estimate, they would think that there was a considerable lack of business methods somewhere else than on the part of the water users.

Mr. Chairman, these water users had no word in the expenditure of this money they have to return. They were forced, if they went in at all, to sign up their lands and trust all to the ability, integrity, and judgment of the employees of the Reclamation Service, and I maintain that under a condition of that character they were entitled to a fair and reasonably accurate estimate of cost, and where those estimates fell short of the actual cost from 50 to 300 per cent they should not be held to the same business code and subject to the same ethics they should have been had they been equal participants in the contract with representation when the advisability of expenditures under the contract were under consideration, with rights of protest, and so forth. Now, I am not throwing any rocks at the Reclamation Service, but I do want to say that the settlers should have every consideration in this case, because they were in most every case misled. This was an entirely new proposition in the United States. The engineers made their estimates no doubt honestly, but each project was of a different nature practically. They could not judge one by the other, and they had no precedents to go by; they thought that they made allowances for all contingencies, but, as I said before, they exceeded their estimates from 50 to 300 per cent, and I think the settlers on these projects who in good faith are attempting to carry out their part of the contract deserve not only consideration at the hands of Congress, but every assistance that can be given them consistently, because the burden on them has been made exceedingly heavy. As I said before, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee. I am more than anxious that this bill pass and become a law, and I believe that it will become a law. I yield back any time I may have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is an exceedingly important amendment. It proposes to make of the reclamation fund a new congressional pork barrel. We are to have one more pork-barrel scramble per annum in Congress if this becomes a law. I think gentlemen are not happy when they refer to the appropriations under the river and harbor bill as a sample of the blessings of pork-barrel legislation. It is true that a majority of the projects appropriated for under the river and harbor bill are proper, and yet it is also true that not only are some of these projects of a character that smell to heaven but that honest men and well-intentioned men who have good projects are obliged to defend those miserable projects that are not justified, because they secure their projects by reason of the fact these other projects are in the bill. There is no justification whatever in making a grab bag and pork barrel out of these expenditures, unless it lie in the fact that the service has been unwise in taking up projects. I am as well satisfied as I ever was in my life that if we take the 27 primary projects of the Reclamation Service, you will find that the service has made fewer mistakes in regard to them than Congress [applause], subject to the pulling and hauling, would have made in the same class of work. Out of 27 projects there are 3 projects which are somewhat questionable. One in Kansas, a pumping project, on which we have spent a lot of money; and yet if Congress had been legislating on this subject, we would have not one but half a dozen of these projects along the twilight zone between aridity and humidity, because that is where Members of Congress come from that have demand upon them for irrigation. We have tried one project of that kind up to the present time, and it is not successful; but it is essential that that should be tried by placing a pumping project in that region for irrigation, and we still hope that there may be something saved out of the Garden City project. There is the Hondo project, which has not been entirely successful. We would have had a dozen Hondos if that matter had been up to Congress.

Take the Missouri River project. Does anybody believe Congress would not be wise to try at least one river-pumping project? Why, we would have had 20 instead of 1 if Congress had been passing upon it. Taking these projects as they stand, we have not been compelled to make an effort to secure them. The projects have been taken up in the judgment of the service without regard to what our views were. We prefer to have it that way rather than to have to come here every session of Congress and attempt to secure new projects which we believe are all right, but which may be unjustifiable, or to secure appropriations larger than necessary for projects already under way. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to yield to my colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE] one minute. He desires to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question. He says this will be a "pork-barrel" proposition. I want to ask him whether the Reclamation Service will not have the right to initiate projects, and Congress will not have the right, even if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; the Reclamation Service will recommend this as the Chief of Engineers now recommends river and harbor works, but that does not prevent all of the evils of river and harbor expenditure.

Mr. MCKENZIE. It protects it, though.

Mr. MONDELL. It protects it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. In my judgment, its adoption would prove obstructive to the operation of the law and very demoralizing to the development of projects. I hardly think any Member will gainsay that the effect in many cases would be to necessitate the suspension of work upon existing projects while awaiting the determination of the Congress as to whether any moneys would be permitted for the completion of projects at the commencement of a new fiscal year. What would be authorized to be expended by one Congress would not constitute a safe criterion for what should be expected of the succeeding Congress or a third or fourth Congress thereafter. We are well aware that the membership of the Congress, or rather of the House, changes more or less every two years, and sometimes the change is very great, while a policy once inaugurated by a bureau or department with so large a percentage of the officials and employees holding their positions under the civil-service law is apt to be continued when under the exclusive administration of such bureau or department, at any rate until experience has shown how improvements may be made.

Mr. Chairman, our legislative experience ought to sufficiently admonish us that such a system as the amendment provides would be conducive of a scramble and competition by the membership, each for his share, and more than his share if he could prevail upon the committee, of available moneys to be expended in his district. It is evident that interested localities would be kept in suspense while awaiting the determination, first of the Committee on Appropriations, and thereafter the vote of the Congress upon the committee recommendations.

Mr. Chairman, it is clear there is no legal necessity for action by the Congress as the amendment provides, because the reclamation act is self-operating, to the extent that no further legislation is needed to authorize the expenditure of reclamation funds. In this respect the law is similar to statutes of various States devoting moneys derivable from a certain source, say for the granting of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, to the public-school fund. No legislation is required to authorize the disposition of such school moneys, but the proper administrative officers proceed under the statutes to use and utilize the moneys as the statutes rovide. But I am not permitted time to here express my views at length, and I wish to reiterate that, in my judgment, the effect of the amendment, duly enacted, would prove obstructive and demoralizing to the operation of the law. I hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When the Reclamation Service was originally inaugurated it might have carried a scheme of congressional regulation as now proposed, but now is not the time to decide upon such a plan of handling the money which shall be paid in If the resolution proposed by Mr. UNDERWOOD prevails the estimates of the Chief of the Reclamation Service will go to the great Committee on Appropriations, a committee which has been and will be for years to come made up largely of Members from east of the Missouri River. The irrigation projects will be subjected to much pull-hauling, and the detailed appropriations will be made by a subcommittee which will get much of its information from a chief clerk. In no time the various projects will be treated in the up-and-down way that the national parks are now treated. In fact, the Secretary of the Interior is endeavoring to provide a special board to devise and estimate these park appropriations and prevent what now happens. Under the proposed amendment the West will find new and unimportant irrigation projects bobbing up and receiving support and appropriations.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I believe in leaving these questions to the people who have charge of the irrigation projects and who understand them, and who have for a considerable length of time studied the irrigation of arid lands in the Western States. They know what they are about, notwithstanding the fact that they have made mistakes. There have been many mistakes in other lines of work for wh'ch we have made large appropriations without even offering apologies. I am opposed to this question of "You tickle me and I'll tickle you." It will at once become a question not of appropriating for meritorious projects, but for the particular district which has the largest representation and the district which has the best "logrollers" in Congress. That is what I think will be the result of the amendment which has just been offered. I believe that Mr. Lane, Mr. Newell, and the engineers who have the irrigation projects in charge, are doing a great work, a work that will last long after them, and I do not believe that this body will vote in favor of the amendment. I hope you will vote it down and continue as before, and by the light of experience carry into fruition the hopes of those who first saw the wonderful possibilities of irrigation and extend and broaden the work rather than to hamper and hinder it. We do not want this great proposition converted into a game of "chuck-a-luck."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Seven minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am particularly opposed to this amendment at this time, especially during the incumbency of Secretary Lane. I believe that it will interfere and trammel him in the equitable administration of the Reclamation Service which he has inaugurated.

Secretary Lane has made a study of reclamation projects such as no other Secretary has heretofore made. He spent several weeks last summer in interviewing the settlers on the various projects. After that consultation was held he spent a month or two in the West investigating each and every project in the various States, and I believe that he is possessed of knowledge of reclamation projects such as no other Secretary has heretofore possessed I believe that this amendment will only result in interfering with the wise policy of an equitable distribution of reclamation funds which he has inaugurated. That it will further jeopardize the rights of such States as Oregon, which have been most unjustly discriminated against in the allotment of reclamation funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, for 12 years the reclamation projects have been in operation, have expended something over $80,000,000, have been an absolute success, and at no time and under no circumstances has there been the slightest suspicion against the administration or against the work. That is a record of which this country ought to be proud. The projects, generally speaking, have been in splendid shape. The director has heretofore handled the matter under the present administration, and I want to call my friend's attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior is the final arbiter; he has secured five men who deal with every subject that comes before the Reclamation Service, every expenditure, every contract, and the decision as to what shall be done goes to these five men, and they must act before anything can be done. No complaints are made. The service is a success.

Now, as to the cheapness of the work, I will say to the gentleman who is opposed to it that the material is cheaper than that used by any other organization in the United States to-day, railroad corporation or otherwise, for these projects. It has been one-third cheaper than any irrigation project under the Carey Act, or any project carried on by a private individual. Look at the record, and it is from 25 to 30 per cent cheaper all along the line. It is a monument to the integrity, to the ability, to the worth and economy of this department, because they have been in shape where they could make their contracts running from one to three years, and depending entirely upon the receipt of the money, and would not have to wait until the year expired and be compelled to say, "We will have to wait, inasmuch as we do not know what our appropriation will be next year." They are familiar with the subject.

And another thing I feel ought to be considered, generally speaking. The Committee on Appropriations is practically unfamiliar with this question. It may seem strange, and some Member might think it funny, but look at the last five years and he will find that the West on these projects has had to take absolutely the word of the Reclamation Service. Some one raised an objection here three years ago, and asked how the funds were being expended.

The President of the United States appointed a board of engineers. That board of engineers went over every reclamation project and investigated the estimates, investigated the work, the amount of money expended, the work to be done, and reported that this Government had not lost a dollar, that the work had been efficient, and yet the expenses had been less than in any other character or kind of work not only in the United States but in every foreign country where they have been dealing in reclamation work. Now, after 12 years of successful operation, why should we turn around and place this money into the fund that should go to the Committee on Appropriations, which, as the record of the House shows, has not had a man on it, except one in this Congress, from the public-land States? And where will they get the information? From the Department of the Interior, of course. The law is all right as it now stands. I am opposed to this amendment. There is no real reason for this change, as I now see it. Figures and statistics are sometimes used unfairly and are very misleading.

The man not fully informed concerning irrigation can use the statistics of it in a way which misleads and leads to delay or injury to the development of the country. The chief fallacies arise from lack of knowledge as to what an irrigation project really is.

An irrigation project is a living, going organism which, like a city, is in one sense never finished. Every year sees changes, some of which may be radical in their nature. Conceived and planned by men of vision, to be built in an undeveloped country of unproved capabilities, away from lines of transportation, without full knowledge of the markets which may be created or even of the kind of crops which will ultimately be developed, the men who originate these must necessarily have optimism tempered by experience.. Even with the spirit of prophecy they can not foresee all the developments which may take place. After the work is well under way there may be far-reaching changes, such as those due to the building of new lines of railroad, which necessarily modify the whole plan, bringing, as they do, new areas within reach of market or removing from cultivation other areas for use as railroad rights of way, for town building, or for other industrial purposes.

In one sense, at no time is the project ever finished. Each year sees new opportunities, new extensions, new restrictions, due to changing conditions of crops, of seepage of the land, of building of drains, or providing additional water supply. It is necessary, of course, in the case of works being built by the Government to arbitrarily assume some point when the project will be finished so far as the Government is concerned, but on many of the projects this point has not yet arrived, because the country has not yet developed to the degree where it can be safely said that the project is finished and that it is not wise to spend further money upon it.

A consideration of the above shows why it is that the comparisons of the estimated cost, made 10 or 12 years ago, with present estimates are wholly unfair and unprofitable. Take, for example, the Salt River project in Arizona. Originally conceived as a small storage reservoir, this plan was later enlarged, and during construction the dam built higher. This was done at the request of the people in the valley who were confident that they could utilize the extra water.

Later extraordinary floods swept away the heads of their principal canals. They importuned the Secretary of the Interior to put in a new heading to save the country from ruin. This he did. When this was done the next request was that he complete and extend the distribution system to the lands.

Originally it was the idea that water would be provided by storage, and that the water users would go to the reservoir, 50 or 100 miles away, and take the water out in canals built by themselves, and in distributing systems to the lands. Later this was found not to be practical, and the Secretary of the Interior was requested to use the reclamation fund for this purpose. This was done.

At a later date it was found that, with the great strides in electrical development, hydroelectric power could be developed at the reservoir and brought to the valley for pumping and for industrial purposes. It was shown that here was an opportunity for notably reducing the acreage cost of the work as well as for extending the area to be irrigated. Accordingly the hydroelectric plant was built.

Now we have the figures of the original conception, namely, for a small dam, brought into comparison with those of the extension works approaching completion. Of course, there is no fair comparison possible other than to show that the original plans have been so materially modified that they are not recognizable in the present work.

The same thing may be said of each of the projects in succession. It is not necessary to go into details, but a man familiar with the conditions can see why it is that the original estimate based on certain assumptions has been greatly exceeded, namely, because the labor and materials have cost more than they did at the time the plans were prepared, but more largely because these plans have been materially modified and many additional structures built which were not originally contemplated.

In the same way the attempt to compare acreages of land anticipated and actually irrigated can not be fairly made unless knowledge is had regarding these elementary facts. In the first instance, large areas of land were found to be capable of irrigation, and it was stated that in a tract of, say, 100,000 acres there would be ample land for irrigation. Later, as the works were developed and built, some of these lands were found to be less valuable than others and were eliminated. Again, it was found that, with the building of railroads and towns and bringing in new lines of transportation, lands which were at first excluded could be taken in. It was found that some of the crops required less water than others, and that the water supply could be carried to other areas, or the reverse. Thus it happens that these early figures, made in anticipation of results, can not be compared fairly with those which have been made later.

The whole conclusion, however, is not that the early estimates were wrong, but that, with larger and more complete knowledge gained year by year, they have been greatly modified. Whatever the cost per acre may now be, the lands are fairly worth it, and are better capable of paying the larger charges per acre than were the original estimates which contemplated the owners of the land going to a distant reservoir or distant main-line canal and providing the distribution system.

I submit the following statement and tables on the question of cost, and so forth, as printed in Engineering and Contracting of date of June 4, 1913:

COST OF IRRIGATION WORKS PER ACRE OF LAND SUPPLIED WITH WATER.

The cost of irrigation works per acre of land irrigated has been tabulated by the United States Reclamation Service for some 140 projects, of which 87 are Carey Act projects, 39 are private projects, and 14 are projects of the service. The data are given in Tables I, II, and III, and from the text accompanying them we take the following:

Under the present conditions of construction the cost per acre of water rights, or of water for irrigation in the arid region, is far higher than is usually appreciated. During earlier decades, before any considerable number of large irrigation canals had been built, it was a relatively simple and inexpensive matter for farmers to join together and build small canals that could be enlarged as the demand for water increased. All such easily available opportunities, however, have been utilized, and development has proceeded to a point where on most of the recent irrigation systems it has been necessary to provide storage, thus adding materially to the cost.

There has also been a notable increase in the cost of labor and of materials used in construction. This condition has been pointed out in various hearings before Congress, notably in the series before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives at the time of the granting of the $20,000,000 loan. It is there shown, notably in a statement submitted by Representative MONDELL, that one of the arguments for increase of the reclamation fund was in the fact that common labor had advanced from the time of the preparation of the plans for works in 1903 and 1904 from 20 to 50 per cent, and that the efficiency of such labor had fallen off in greater proportion. Costs were also affected by the increased price of materials and equipment.

The figures in Tables I, II, and III, obtained from printed reports of State engineers and public data, show that on over 90 modern irrigation systems being built by private or corporate capital the cost per acre averages nearly $53. This cost does not include the annual cost for operation and maintenance.

The cost to the settler is increased by the fact that payment is made on most of these projects in installments bearing interest at 6 per cent or even more. The total payments made for such a water right with simple interest at 6 per cent would be about $70.50 per acre on the basis of 10 equal annual installments of the principal as compared to $53 without interest.

For comparison with the cost of the foregoing private and Carey Act projects, there is given in table 3 a partial list of the projects being built under the terms of the reclamation act, showing the total acreages in them and the charges for water rights for completed portions of such projects, as far as these have been fixed by public announcement of the Secretary of the Interior. These figures are seen to average a little over $41 per acre.

It is interesting to note that the average cost of water from the Government works is about $12 per acre less than from the recent private works of comparable size. The real difference is still greater, because of the fact that deferred payments on Government works do not draw interest.

This difference is further accentuated by the greater probability of the water users under the Government projects receiving an adequate water supply, as this matter has been given more careful consideration and deficiency guarded against with greater care than in the private investments. In fact, it is known that in a few cases at least there is not water enough for the entire area of land included in these projects. Also, on the Government works provision in many cases has been made for drainage such as has not been provided by the private works, and the water is, as a rule, brought nearer to the land to be irrigated, still further reducing the cost to the water user.

Summing up all of these advantages—lower first cost, absence of interest, more dependable water supply, and more complete works—it would appear to be fair to state that water from the Government projects is obtained at one-half to two-thirds the cost of that from private works here listed, including those built under the terms of the Carey Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate somewhat in opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], because that gentleman has been friendly to this measure and, I think, understands thoroughly the problems confronting the men in the West as well as in the new South who are trying to develop the country. But I want to say, Mr. Chairman, if we pass this amendment, which limits the action of the reclamation board and handicaps effective service, I believe we can tack at the top of this reclamation bill the words "red tape," which is altogether too much in evidence in governmental matters. Red tape strikes terror and disappointment and discouragement to the heart of every man who contemplates qualifying under these reclamation projects.

Mr. Chairman, the average Congressman knows little or nothing about the details of reclamation work, nor does he have the time to become expert. Congressional knowledge is insufficient and congressional interference will result in uncertainty. Expert control by Secretary Lane and Director Newell spells success.

Four hundred and thirty-five men have been here for 500 days trying to enact legislation, and if there is any one feature of it that has been exploited over the country as working to the disadvantage of the country it is that recent legislation has been done in an unfinished and unscientific way.

Gentlemen speak of river and harbor improvements; the details of this line of work differ greatly from those of river and harbor improvements. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] or any other man knows that river and harbor improvements have to do with the rivers and harbors of the United States. On the other hand, these projects have to do with the private property of a thousand different men under each project, and little disappointing features come up from time to time and from day to day that change the conditions and tend to embarrass those that are at the head of the Reclamation Service.

Now, sir, I believe that the Secretary of the Interior and the officials of the Reclamation Service thoroughly understand the situation. I think they are better qualified to carry on this work than are Members of Congress. They are specialists in their particular line. They have expert workmen, and I would sooner at any time take the judgment of an expert on this question than run the risk of partial consideration and hurried attention by 435 Congressmen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois give me another minute?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the time.

Mr. FALCONER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to my colleague, Mr. FOSTER.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. It seems to me that one of the best arguments that could be made for an amendment of this kind is the fact that we have just listened to the appeals made by gentlemen advocating this bill before the committee, when it is admitted that even under the system that they now have, which they now say is so good, they have expended much more money than has been necessary, until finally the homesteaders on the projects have gotten in such a condition that they are unable to pay interest, and their representatives are here asking an extension of time for 10 years on these reclamation projects.

Now, I do not believe that Congress is so inefficient; I do not believe that Members would consider lightly these reclamation projects. They are important projects, and I do not think they would consider them in such a way as to do harm to the Reclamation Service. I believe that the Congress of the United States wants to encourage the making of more homes in the West, and one way to do that is through the successful execution of these irrigation projects. Anyone who has seen that country, where but a few years ago there was nothing but sagebrush and sand, and to-day see the beautiful farms that have been developed there, can not help but believe that a great work is being done in that section.

But the representatives of those people come now and ask for 10 years' additional time in which the homesteaders may pay for the expense of the projects. They ask that the Government shall give this money 10 years longer without interest, and the plea in justification of it is made that it has cost so much more per acre than was estimated for originally, and that these people are now unable to pay for it. They come forward and say that because you want to change the system and let Congress appropriate and require that estimates be submitted each year you are doing an injustice to these homesteaders. It seems to me there is an inconsistency somewhere in the argument of our friends from the West. No man is more interested in the success of the Reclamation Service than I am, but in my judgment Congress should know each year just what is being done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado has two minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has eight minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to use all my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have yielded to various Members all the time I have except two minutes. I only desire at this time to say that I look upon this amendment as ill advised and unnecessary, and if it is adopted by Congress, I believe that it will be looked upon hereafter as a mistake.

The trouble is going to be that if this amendment is adopted it will simply force all the Western States into a pork-barrel scramble for this money, and from this good hour on the water users and the Representatives from those States where the irrigation projects are being constructed will organize a systematic plan of operations to get as much money as possible for each one of these projects; and a State like Texas—a great big State, which furnishes not a dollar to this fund and which has a large and strong delegation in Congress—will have a great advantage over the other Western States. The State of California, for example, will have an advantage over each of the other Western States by reason of its large delegation in Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I can not yield a part of only two minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield to the gentleman a couple of minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Very well. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that this amendment will lead to a pork barrel.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; so far as we of the arid States are concerned. It will lead to a pork-barrel scramble among us, each logrolling to get all he can.

Mr. MANN. Is not this the fact: That the amount of money in the reclamation fund is so much, and no more can be appropriated? How, then, does that make a pork barrel?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It will compel an unseemly scramble among us to determine to what States that money will go and which will get the most.

Mr. MANN. A pork barrel is where they all combine, not where they determine among themselves how a fixed sum of money shall be applied.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There will be a free-for-all scramble, a perpetual strife among us, to get that money.

Mr. MANN. That will probably lead to a careful examination of the merits of each project.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think it will lead to logrolling and scheming, and the projects in those States which have the larger delegations will, I fear, get the larger amounts. I fear that merit may not always control the division of that fund.

Mr. MANN It will not lead to a scramble when there is no more money

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, did the Chair count the minute I yielded to the gentleman from Colorado?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Appropriations will have its time taken up with listening to delegations both of Congressmen and people from all of these projects and every Western State, whereas this matter ought to be and can be in a more systematic way determined by the reclamation engineers and officials, as it has been heretofore. I admit that in former years considerable money has been wasted, but at the present time the Reclamation Service is in a splendid condition, and I feel it is more or less of a reflection on the service for Congress at this time to take this action in this hasty manner. If the reclamation law needs amending in this respect it should be in a separate bill. I feel that this amendment ought not to go into this bill. I hope it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is entitled to seven minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have already expended $375,000,000 on the Panama Canal. Every dollar of that sum had to be estimated for every year. If we had not had supervision by the Committee on Appropriations there is not any doubt in the world but that we would have spent twice as much as we have expended on the construction of the Panama Canal.

Nobody can say that the Committee on Appropriations of this House is a pork-barrel committee. There is no committee in this House or in any other House that is so diligent in the discharge of its duty as is the Committee on Appropriations of the House. It is always anxious to conserve the expenditures of the public money. There is no man anywhere in the executive branch of this Government too big to be called before that committee. Every man, either in business or in public life, who knows that he has somebody watching him and to whom he is obliged to report, will perform his duty with more economy and better dispatch and with more system than he will if he is allowed to go untrammeled and do as he pleases. And so it is no reflection on the Department of the Interior for its officials to be called before the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

As to the pork-barrel scramble referred to by my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and by other gentlemen on the floor in opposition to this amendment, I want to say that there are only about 30 men representing the States in which the land is being reclaimed and upon which this money is being expended.

The other 405 Members of the House are only indirectly interested in the reclamation. They are interested in seeing that the money is properly expended and where it ought to be expended.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield. And we, if we are here, or whoever may be here, will act as a jury to see that no reclamation projects are entered upon except those which are meritorious; and if you gentlemen in the arid regions want to enter upon a logrolling proposition in order to get a pork-barrel scheme into your reclamation project, all right, enter upon it, but we will see that you do not do it successfully. We are here as an American jury to prevent your packing the pork barrel with pork. There never was a more meritorious amendment than the one now pending.

It simply provides that the money received from the sale of public lands shall be expended for the reclamation of other public lands after estimates have been made as to what lands are necessary to be reclaimed and the amount of money necessary to be expended upon them; and to say that the Congress of the United States, whose Members come from every section of the Union, are, 405 of them, to be subject to the control of these 30 men, and that no Member is to have anything to say about the reclamation of the arid lands, except the 30 men coming from the arid region, is unfair. It is unjust and unfair for them to say or even to suppose the rest of us are going to be unfair and discriminating, except in so far as discriminating means that we are going to see that the public funds are expended economically and wisely. I will venture to say that if we had had jurisdiction over the expenditure of this money from the beginning of these reclamation projects, several million dollars—I do not know how much, but more than $1,000,000—would not have been expended on projects where it has been discovered that there is no water and never will be any. The Committee on Appropriations will be able to ascertain by communications from the Secretary of the Interior or the Chief of the Bureau of Reclamation what the conditions are. This committee has jurisdiction over the expenditure in every department of the Government, and I have yet to hear anyone say that it has ever acted unwisely or extravagantly, or that it has entered into any combination for the improper expenditure of public money; but every statement made about that committee has been to the effect, no matter what the politics of the committee may have been, that if anything it was rather more parsimonious than it ought to be; and I would infinitely prefer to have the charge made against me that I was more parsimonious in the expenditure of public money than that I was extravagantly reckless in its expenditure. And I think that is where we have to draw the line now. We have already reached the point where we must conserve the expenditure of the public moneys received from the sale of the public lands and to see that no dollar of that money is expended by any single individual; because, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, no matter how patriotic or able a public official or private individual may be, if he knows that he is compelled to report to somebody else what he is doing, he will be thinking the whole year round just how he can economize, and how he can expend the money to get the best results, so that when he appears before the body that has the right to interrogate him, he will be able to make a report that will stand the light of the sun, instead of being subject to criticism for undue extravagance in the expenditure of public money. We are about to expend $200,000,000 for the reclamation of public lands in the irrigation region; and to say that the people of the United States ought not to know in advance how this money is to be expended is to say that they are not to be trusted.

I hope the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be reported again.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], just reported.

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. BRYAN), there were 40 ayes and 21 noes.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the ayes are 40 and the noes are 21, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that comes too late to affect the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order made by the gentleman from Washington is too late.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington made the point of no quorum as soon as the Chair announced the result; and while it is true there may be a form to be used, that is the practice that has been followed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, rather than have any question about it, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, all the friends of reclamation around me insist that I shall withdraw my point of no quorum, although I think it is a mistake——

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BRYAN. I am going to withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington withdraws his point of no quorum.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following section:

"SEC. 17. That it is hereby declared to be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of the reclamation law, so far as the same may be practicable, and subject to the existence of feasible irrigation projects, to expend the major portion of the funds arising from the sale of public lands within each State contributing thereto for the benefit of arid and semiarid lands within the limits of such State: Provided, That the Secretary may temporarily use such portion of said funds for the benefit of arid or semiarid lands in any particular State contributing thereto as he may deem advisable, but when so used the excess shall be restored to the fund as soon as practicable, to the end that ultimately, and in any event within each 20-year period after the passage of this act, the expenditures for the benefit of the said States shall be equalized according to the proportions and subject to the conditions as to practicability and feasibility aforesaid: Provided, That this section shall not affect any existing established project."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offered this same amendment in the committee when this bill was being considered in the committee some months ago, after its passage through the Senate. I then reserved the right to offer it on the floor of the House. In explanation of this amendment I desire to state that its object is to restore the old repealed section 9 of the original reclamation act as far as it can be done consistently with the proposed 20 years' extension period for payments by settlers. Section 9 of the reclamation act passed in 1902 contemplated that within each 10-year period after its passage there should be an equitable and equal expenditure of the reclamation funds in the States contributing to this fund. Section 9 was repealed June 25, 1910. This repeal and its effect on my State has been a matter of the most bitter debate and controversy in the State of Oregon, and ever since its passage has been a vital issue in every senatorial and congressional election there. The people of Oregon feel keenly the discrimination practiced against them since section 9 of the reclamation act was repealed. The report of the Reclamation Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shows Oregon second in the list of contributors to the reclamation fund. It contributed the sum of $10,317,387.18. Up to that time Oregon stood tenth in the list of allottees of reclamation funds, having been allotted but $4,334,218.77; of this amount $1,277,132.61 were repaid, leaving a net investment of $3,057,086.16.

Secretary Lane, at the urgent solicitation of the Oregon delegation in both Houses, has recognized this unjust discrimination made against the State of Oregon and in a great measure has endeavored to mete out justice to us. Since this last report of the Reclamation Service, of April 30, 1913, there have been allotted to various States up to April 30, 1914, by Secretary Lane, $10,307,396.73. Out of this sum Oregon has been allotted $1,294,724.08.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What State has turned in the most money?

Mr. SINNOTT. North Dakota has turned in the most money. The amendment which I have offered will give equal justice to North Dakota, Oklahoma, and the other States that have been discriminated against.

The Twelfth Annual Report of the Reclamation Service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, on page 296, shows the following contributions to the reclamation fund by the various States:

1. North Dakota	$11,821,801.07
2. Oregon	10,317,387.80
3. Montana	8,335,000.00
4. South Dakota	6,753,352.65
5. Colorado	6,483,000.00
6. Washington	6,386,566.63
7. Oklahoma	5,765,000.00
8. California	5,184,693.44
9. Idaho	4,940,585.11
10. Wyoming	4,287,140.75
11. New Mexico	3,856,000.00
12. Utah	1,728,093.61
13. Nebraska	1,635,149.31
14. Arizona	1,111,412.37
15. Kansas	951,993.44
16. Nevada	519,633.85

The same report, on page 296, shows the allotment of said fund by States to be as follows:

Order of allotment.	Amount.	Order of contribution.
1. Arizona	$16,003,004.15	14
2. Idaho	15,783,336.92	9
3. Montana	8,825,663.40	3
4. Washington	8,329,607.38	6
5. Colorado	8,130,357.00	5
6. Wyoming	7,377,417.38	10
7. Nevada	6,218,503.63	16
8. Nebraska	6,012,377.01	13
9. New Mexico	4,493,343.12	11
10. Oregon	4,334,218.77	2
11. Utah	3,453,877.02	12
12. South Dakota	3,388,000.00	4
13. California	2,595,962.24	8
14. North Dakota	2,273,351.01	1
15. Texas	2,103,200.00	.....
16. Kansas	419,000.00	15
17. Oklahoma	71,933.26	7

It will thus be seen from the report ending June 30, 1913, that while Oregon contributed $10,317,387.80 to the reclamation fund, up to that date Oregon was only allotted $4,334,218.77.

I have been furnished by the Reclamation Service with a statement showing the changes in the allotments since the report of June 30, 1913, which shows:

The April, 1914, number of the Reclamation Record, a magazine published under the auspices of the Reclamation Service, gives in round numbers the receipts or contributions and allotments by States to the reclamation fund, also the percentages of contributions allotted to each State. It shows:

Expenditures and receipts by States.

State.	Total allotment.	Total receipts.	Per cent.
Arizona	$17,525,000	$1,300,000	1,348
California	3,026,000	5,777,000	52
Colorado	9,076,000	7,090,000	128

Mr. Chairman, in the State of Oregon there are some 17,000,000 acres of public lands, and 13,000,000 acres additional in the forest reserves. Upon the forest reserves there stand nearly 140,000,000,000 feet of timber, worth from $2.50 to $3 a thousand feet. We expect that the proceeds of these great resources within the boundaries of our State will ultimately reach and swell the reclamation fund. We feel, as was originally contemplated by the reclamation act, that we should have the right to demand, as a matter of law, our share of our magnificent resources pouring into the reclamation fund; that we should not be dependent solely on the bounty or benevolence of any Secretary of the Interior for our share of the reclamation funds. My amendment will place all States on an equal footing without favoritism. Oregon has streams possessing over 3,000,000 water horsepower. In such a State it is idle to contend that there are no feasible irrigation projects. There are innumerable projects capable of development in my district, in Crook County, in the Deschutes Basin, on the John Day River, in Malheur County, in Baker County, and other counties of eastern Oregon.

To develop these projects we feel that we are entitled to know that we will receive our share of the reclamation funds by virtue of statutory law and not at the pleasure of some official occupying the office of Secretary of Interior 10 or 15 years hence.

The people of my State are not envious of the liberal, free-handed manner in which these funds have been allotted to some of the other States, but we are certainly jealous of what we consider to be our rights, and feel that our rights will be assured to us only by the passage of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to agree on a limit of debate. Can not we agree on 10 minutes?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I want five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my approval of the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT]. I can see no harm that will come from restoring section 9 of the original reclamation act to the present law. As a matter of good faith, the section never should have been repealed. Now, since we are remodeling the reclamation act, and extending the time for 20 years, instead of 10 years, in which the settlers shall pay the cost of construction of a project, this would be the proper time for this House to restore section 9 or the principle upon which it is based.

In the Sixty-second Congress when this proposition came up to repeal section 9, the bill was pending before the Committee on Ways and Means. I appeared before that committee and urged that the bond bill be so amended as to leave that section in the law. The committee believed the provisions of the section had led to abuses. When the bond bill came before the House I tried to amend the bill by striking out section 6, which repealed section 9. My amendment did not prevail, so section 9 was repealed. The repeal of section 9 was a mistake. It appeared much like an act of bad faith on the part of the Government.

As I said the other day at the beginning of the discussion of this bill, when the reclamation act was passed, there was an understanding between the Representatives from the 16 States and Territories of the West as to what this bill should contain, as to what principle should control in the distribution of this fund, and it was distinctly stated in the report and in the discussion that it was the design of section 9 to guarantee that the benefits arising from this great new policy the National Government was about to undertake should be, so far as possible, distributed equitably among the States from which that fund came. Oklahoma has contributed $6,000,000, or practically that amount, to that fund. So far no irrigation project has been undertaken in the State. If this section is reenacted it does not mean that this fund must go to Oklahoma, because the fund can only be used there on condition that a practicable and feasible project can be found and approved by the Department of the Interior. We have just passed an amendment to the pending bill requiring the reclamation fund to be appropriated by Congress before it can be used. We are thus putting an additional restraint and safeguard on this fund. We do not ask any of this fund to be expended uselessly in our State; we only ask that section 9 be restored as an act of good faith. It seems to me Representatives from those States wherein the bulk of this fund has been expended should show their magnanimity by voting for this proposed amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I will state that we are opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], proposing to reenact section 9 of the original reclamation law, which requires the expenditure of the money in the States in which the funds originated. Section 9 was repealed in 1910 as a part of a bill creating certificates of indebtedness against the reclamation fund. Extensive hearings were had before the Committee on Ways and Means, and in a report made after those hearings this statement was made by Mr. PAYNE:

> The part of the act referred to which required that moneys should be expended in the several States in fair proportion to the amount contributed by each State to the fund led to an insistent demand by representatives from the various States and Territories affected for the expenditure within their borders of their just pro rata share.
> In yielding to this demand the department was led to undertake the simultaneous construction of works involving cost far beyond the current receipts of the fund.

For this reason section 9 was repealed.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can not yield when I have but two minutes. Section 9 led to the beginning of work on some 32 projects, and the money in the reclamation fund has not been large enough to carry all of these projects promptly to completion. If we restore this abandoned section to the law, we will return to the same bad system and create a demand for a large number of new projects. We believe it is better to complete projects that have now been initiated and then to take up new projects one at a time as we have the money in the reclamation fund. I hope the amendment will be defeated and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 8, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the bill with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendments and bill to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask, the previous question having been ordered, if this bill will be the unfinished business to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will be the first thing after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker ruled the other way.

The SPEAKER. No; the Speaker ruled the way the Speaker is ruling now; he has just looked it up.

Mr. MANN. I know the Speaker did rule the other way.

The SPEAKER. To be fair with the gentleman, there was some dispute about that question of the Speaker ruling that way once, but the Chair knows he ruled the other way last week, and he thinks the last ruling is the better practice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the gentleman from Illinois desires to make a motion to recommit and probably would desire a roll call, and I prefer to get a quorum here to-morrow morning.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of the amendments.

Mr. RAKER. I want a separate vote on the last amendment; not to-night, though.

The SPEAKER. Is it desired to vote on the amendments now? Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Underwood amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington desires a separate vote on the Underwood amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. No; let us dispose of the other amendments first.

The SPEAKER. That is right. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment; if not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Underwood amendment.

The Underwood amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a division; I am against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had a chance to vote against it.

Mr. BRYAN. I asked for a division.

The SPEAKER. That is a different thing; the gentleman from Washington demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 24.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum; and pending that, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington raises the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

The Speaker proceeded to count.

During the counting,

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRYAN. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not do that now.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 15110. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept conveyance of title to certain land between the post-office site and Madison Street, in the city of Thomasville, Ga.;

H. R. 8688. An act for the relief of Lucien P. Rogers; and

H. R. 17041. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, July 30, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 18137) granting an increase of pension to Katharine A. Ringhiser; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILMORE: A bill (H. R. 18138) granting a pension to Delia M. Mullarkey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MANN: A bill (H. R. 18139) granting an increase of pension to Elma A. Dockstader; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OLDFIELD: A bill (H. R. 18140) for the relief of the heirs of John E. Stewart, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. TAVENNER: A bill (H. R. 18141) for the relief of Harry C. Twomey; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VOLLMER: A bill (H. R. 18142) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob Thomas; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petitions signed by certain citizens of Connecticut urging the passage of the Hobson prohibition amendment; to the Committee on Rules.

Also (by request) resolution signed by pastors of certain churches at Oakland, Cal., and East Liverpool, Ohio, protesting against the practice of polygamy in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BELL of California: Petition of 53 citizens of Los Angeles and 42 people of Yorba Linda and Second United Presbyterian Church of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, memorial of Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, urging passage of water-power legislation at this session of Congress; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of Nelson A. Miles Camp, No. 10, Spanish War Veterans, of California, asking that the frigate Independence be brought to San Francisco for use in connection with the Panama-Pacific Exposition; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BRUCKNER: Petition of Railway Age Gagette, New York City, relative to replacing of wooden passenger cars by steel ones; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New York, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of Daggett & Ramsdell, of New York City, favoring passage of the Ransdell-Humphreys river-regulation bill; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petitions of I. F. Moritz, the O. J. Gude Co., and I. Greenberg, all of New York City, protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of William Barthman, of New York City, favoring passage of the Owen-Goeke bill, relative to fraud in gold-filled watchcases; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of Cotton Belt Lodge, No. 204, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, relative to equipping all engines on railroads with electric headlights; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Bricklayers' Benevolent and Protective Union, No. 1, of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring approval of amendment to the Sherman law in relation to trade-unions; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution of masters, mates, and pilots of the Pacific, favoring amendment to H. R. 16346; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. BURKE of South Dakota: Petition of business men of Pierre, S. Dak., favoring the passage of H. R. 5308, relative to taxing mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CURRY: Petitions of 17 residents of California, in favor of prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of Miss Mary T. Hawley, of Lodi, Cal., in favor of equal suffrage; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Lodi, Cal., in favor of prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of R. Rose, of Sanitarium, Cal., in favor of prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of northern and central California, representing more than 5,000 women, in favor of prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. HOWELL: Petition of sundry citizens of Ogden, Utah, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa: Petition of sundry citizens of Keokuk, Iowa, protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND: Petitions of 20 citizens of the State of California, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petitions from the Southern California Conference of the Free Methodist Church, and the Melrose Methodist Episcopal Church, of Oakland, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of the Colonel John B. Wyman Circle, No. 22, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Oakland, Cal., protesting against any change in the national flag; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PROUTY: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of East Peru, 150 people of Milo, and citizens of Indianola and Altoona, Iowa, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petition of citizens of Perry, Iowa, favoring Poindexter resolution to adjust the polar contention; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RAKER. Resolution in re water-power legislation, adopted by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce at its regular meeting, July 8, 1914, relative to water-power legislation at this session of Congress; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, resolution by the Department Veteran Army of the Philippines, at the thirteenth annual convention, held at Baguio, P. I., relative to civil-service conditions in Philippine Islands; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. THOMAS: Petition of Ernest E. Green, of Edmonson County, Kentucky, protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. THOMSON of Illinois: Petition of members of Millburn Church, of Millburn, Ill., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. WALLIN: Petition of Methodist Episcopal Churches of Mayfield and Cranberry Creek, N. Y., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 30, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, July 27, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Gronna	Nelson	Simmons
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Hollis	Norris	Smoot
Bryan	Hughes	O'Gorman	Stone
Burton	Jones	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
Crawford	Kern	Perkins	Thornton
Culberson	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Reed	West
Gallinger	Myers	Sheppard	Williams

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. TILLMAN, and Mr. WHITE answered to their names when called.

Mr. CATRON entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] and to state that he is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instruction of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. JOHNSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. OVERMAN was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Claims and the Committee on the University of the United States.

Mr. STONE was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOLLIS was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. HUGHES was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to introduce an amendment to the pending bill to be laid on the table and printed. It will be offered at some later time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendments in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee as amended.

FRANK WOODRUFF KELLOGG.

Mr. BRISTOW. Out of order I should like to introduce the following bills——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I am compelled to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk a bill and ask the Secretary to read it. Then I will ask the Chair if it comes within the rule as to bills which may be introduced.

The SECRETARY. A bill for the relief of Frank Woodruff Kellogg.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it a personal relief bill, I will ask the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Frank Woodruff Kellogg, now a captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, to the active list of captains of the United States Navy, to take rank next after Capt. Thomas Snowden, United States Navy: Provided, That the said Frank Woodruff Kellogg shall be carried as additional to the number in the grade to which he may be appointed under this act and as additional to any grade to which he may at any time hereafter be promoted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the introduction of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object to the bill if it does not fall within the class of "personal relief" measures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the bill, being a bill for the correction of a naval record by an act of Congress, may be left with the Secretary as are other similar bills.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state that the bill proposes to reinstate an officer who was "plucked," together with several others in regard to whom the House Committee on Naval Affairs is having hearings. I have promised to introduce the bill. Of course, if the rule under which the Senate is operating precludes its introduction I shall have to submit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not believe it does.

The bill (S. 6178) for the relief of Frank Woodruff Kellogg was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire if pension bills come under the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They do. They may be left with the Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I make the point that bills can not be introduced on the floor, but that they may be introduced by leaving them with the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is all the Senator from Kansas asks to do, as the Chair understands.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. KERN. I ask to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will not make a point of order on this proceeding, but it seems to me excusing Senators from serving on committees is just as much morning business as is anything else. I shall not object, however, but it certainly is not the consideration of the trade commission bill.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 15613, commonly known as the Federal trade commission bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] devoted a part of his discussion yesterday to the consideration of some criticisms which I made on the day before to that part of the bill now before the Senate which provides for the creation of a Federal trade commission, one of which was that its effect would be the regulation instead of the prevention of monopoly. The Senator's view of the proposition is, of course, diametrically opposite to my own, and the bill was no doubt drawn in accordance with the Senator's theory. I know that he, in common with a majority of the Interstate Commerce Committee, in drafting and presenting this measure had no other object in view than the prevention and removal of monopolistic conditions. I have no quarrel whatever with those who believe that such is the object to be subserved, and which will be subserved if this bill becomes a law; and, much as I object to the establishment of any more commissions, unless their creation be absolutely necessary to safeguard the public welfare, I might be constrained to vote for it if I were convinced that the position taken by the Senator from Iowa is the correct one.

Mr. President, the so-called antitrust act or Sherman law of 1890, which did not create a commission, was designed to prevent monopoly; its object was to interdict all restraints of trade or combinations which would result in monopoly. The administration of that law, at first ineffective and ultimately more vigorous, has served neither to prevent the existence of monopolies nor to limit them to those which were in existence at the time of its enactment. Speaking generally, the effect of that law upon trade conditions has been to regulate instead of remove the evils which brought it into existence; and the Supreme Court, in defining and applying that law, has seen fit to interpolate into the text of it a word which the Congress of the United States deliberately refused to put into it; a change which necessarily makes it a regulative instead of a prohibitory act. I fear, Mr. President, that the outcome of the bill now pending, in its practical application to our industrial and economic affairs, will be along the same lines, and will ultimately, therefore, regulate, as the Progressive platform provides for, instead of prevent the evils of which we complain and which we all desire to avoid.

The commission is to be equipped both with the power and the duty of preventing unfair competition or unfair methods of competition, which may be, but which I do not think are, tantamount to the same thing. It must operate through an investigation of complaints, either initiated by itself or which are to be initiated before it by those having or presuming to have knowledge of the things which need investigation. It operates, in other words, by trying, by examining into, and by investigating given infractions of the law against unfair competition, as those infractions may be brought to its attention; and, of course, as the power to determine involves the power to hear, the result is that after the testimony is received and the commission is advised as to the given instance, it passes judgment upon that instance, either against or for the contention of the petitioner; either as declaring that the particular act or acts violate or do not violate the law.

This means, Mr. President, that competition is to be made lawful by a process of elimination. The things which are within the statute and the things which are without the statute are to be determined as the result of individual instances of investigation; and out of the statute, therefore, we are going to establish a sort of common law of competition, if I may use that term in connection with decisions based upon a statute. So that the monopolies of the country, the corporations which are not monopolistic engaged in interstate commerce, and, if the last amendment of the Senator from Iowa is to be adopted, individuals and partnerships are to have their competitive powers regulated—perhaps I should not say regulated; are to have their competitive powers and opportunities defined, not permanently but continuously by a continuing series of investigations. The result of that, to my mind, must be the regulation of competition, which involves the regulation of those within the jurisdiction of this commission, the determination by its acts and by its decrees of what is fair and what is unfair in the rivalry of commercial forces for the markets of the country. It is therefore inevitable that the logical outgrowth of the creation of this commission is the perpetuation of monopolistic conditions in this country.

It may be said that monopoly and fair competition can not coexist; but those who make that assertion also declare that unfair competition is an element in business that is separate and apart from restraints of trade and combinations which lead to monopoly and at which the Sherman Act was aimed; in other words, that it is independent of and covers different subjects from those which are covered and intended to be covered by the antitrust laws. It seems to me, Mr. President, that these positions are not reconcilable. I am of the opinion that the subject matter of the statutes and of this bill must to a large degree be identical. I can not conceive of a monopoly that does not practice unfair competition, whether it be lawful competition or not; it is difficult to conceive of the creation or the progress of a monopoly except by processes which, to some extent, consist of what is generally known as unfair competition, and so long as the institutions which practice it are permitted to exist just so long must those practices continue.

You can not do away with unfair competition and at the same time tolerate the existence of huge aggregations of manufacturers and of capital. You can not tolerate their existence, on the one hand, as they are at present constructed, and by any sort of process, whether operated by a commission or otherwise, eliminate the practice of unfair competition. You may define what it consists of; you may define what it does not consist of; but just so long as they continue, Mr. President, will these conditions to a greater or less extent continue, and the living example and illustration of the fact is the impotence of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the face of these difficulties.

It tries to, but it does not, so regulate transportation that it is fair and equal to all sections of the country and to all its patrons; it tries to define, but it is unable to enforce, all those things which every man of common sense engaged in business knows to be wrong, as it is not competent to require the observance of all those which are and which the public instinctively recognize as being fair and just. Consequently it is engaged in an impossible scheme of satisfactory regulation, and yet it can do nothing more than to regulate; we can not very well regulate an evil by recognizing or permitting the existence of the evil itself. We can minimize its results, but we can not abolish them. Hence I am not convinced, although the argument is a good one, and certainly a most earnest and sincere one, that this commission, if created, will result in an extinction of the monopolistic conditions of which we complain.

I concede, Mr. President—and I think I said so the other day—after listening to the argument of the Senator from Iowa and of some of the other Senators upon the subject, that to provide for the prevention of unfair competition in terms is perhaps as definite as a statute upon that subject ought to be. Hence I am not combating the phraseology proposed by the committee. I content myself with the assertion that in the administration of the law it will resolve itself into one which regulates but does not remove monopoly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must have misunderstood the Senator from Colorado, I think, and I desire to be certain about it. I understood him to say, in the beginning of his remarks, that the act of 1890 prohibited restraints of trade but not monopoly.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; if I said so, I was unfortunate. What I think I said and what I intended to say was that the purpose of the antitrust law of 1890 was to prohibit restraints of trade and monopolistic combinations also.

Mr. CUMMINS. The second section of the act of 1890, as the Senator of course knows, is a direct prohibition of any attempt to monopolize or any monopolization of the commerce of the United States or any part of the commerce of the United States. If that statute was made effective, it seems to me to be as perfect an effort to destroy monopoly as we could possibly make. I can not conceive of any more direct attack upon monopoly than is contained in the second section of the antitrust law; and if it remains in full force and effect, and if it is efficiently administered, have we not all the instrumentalities that we can have to destroy monopoly and to prevent any attempt to monopolize?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think that the second section of the act to which the Senator calls my attention was designed to, and if rigidly enforced perhaps would, meet the evil and make our present attempts at further legislation unnecessary. I believe, however, that if it were supplemented by the enactment of such a measure as the Williams bill, now pending in the committee, the two together would certainly, if observed and enforced, do away with monopolistic conditions in this country if they can rid it of them by legislation; but the unfortunate fact remains that, notwithstanding the prohibitory statute of 1890, and in spite of it, perhaps 75 per cent of the monopolies with which the country is overrun have been conceived, brought forth, and reached their maturity in the face of it; and this has been made possible by the privileges, permissions, and encouragement of State legislation.

When the State of New Jersey creates and confirms such a combination as the Harvester Trust as lawful under its statutes, when the State of New Jersey and other States arm and equip such a combination with power to invade the commerce of every State in the Union and exercise all the vast and unrestrained power and authority conferred upon it by State charter, the prohibitive statute of the United States has been powerless to cope with such a condition; which justifies the humorous, but decidedly philosophic, suggestion of Mr. Dooley, that it might be well for the United States to incorporate under the laws of New Jersey in order to secure sufficient power and authority to cope with, restrain, and overcome its other artificial and far-reaching creations.

Therefore, I say that the Williams bill should supplement this measure; and the two together, in all probability, I firmly believe, would offer a statutory corrective not only for future, but for existing present conditions.

I was about to ask when interrupted, having referred not only to the judicial construction, but to the interpolation of words in another section of the antitrust act, which never should have been put there, and which were put there by judicial authority, that inasmuch as evidently all of the cases and controversies which come before this commission must find their way to the courts, and there be ultimately decided, what warrant have we for supposing that the Supreme Court of the United States will not declare that when we said here that "unfair competition shall be unlawful," we meant that "unreasonably" unfair competition should be unlawful, or "unduly" unfair competition should be unlawful; that we did not mean what we said, and did not say what we meant?

Upon the assumption that such may be the construction of the statute, what would remain of it but a mere power on the part of the commission to regulate the manner in which these companies shall do business hereafter in the United States, the regulation itself being in terms subject to an appeal to the courts. I go further, and ask why should we establish a commission which will be nothing but an intermediary? No matter what its decision may be, the courts must ultimately determine whether that decision shall or shall not become effective. This means delay, discouragement, and demand for fresh and supplemental legislation.

I do not for a moment want to be understood as counseling a denial to citizens of the right to appeal to the courts from these orders. What I have objected to is that we are to create a commission which will occupy practically the position of a subordinate court of appeals, one more intermediary between litigants and the court of final resort, when in the ultimate analysis of things it is the Supreme Court of the United States that must determine each individual case.

Regulation seems to me to be as inevitable from these conditions as the succession of the seasons. Hence I am unable, as yet, to perceive the wisdom, the expediency, or the necessity of launching another commission upon the commission-ridden people of the United States, armed with power and authority exceeding that of all the rest of them put together, and yet subordinated to a tribunal whose dockets are already crowded with the accumulated appeals of several years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have had occasion to comment at some length on the vague character of section 5 of this bill, if the term "unfair competition" shall not be limited by construction to its strict legal meaning. The confusion which will result, the vague character of the term which is employed in that view of the bill, can not be better illustrated than by some of the statements made by the various proponents of the measure.

President Wilson, in his address to Congress of January 20, 1914, used the following language:

> The business of the country awaits also—has long awaited, and has suffered because it could not obtain—further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is.

Those are words of wisdom, Mr. President, with which I am most heartily in accord.

> Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible—

Definitions, however, do not seem to be possible to the Senators who prepared or assisted in preparing this measure—> at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute—

I commend that statement to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], that these practices can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute—> in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainly, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

> And the business men of the country desire something more than that the menace of legal process in these matters be made explicit and intelligible. They desire the advice, the definite guidance, and information which can be supplied by an administrative body, an interstate trade commission.

The idea of the President seems to have been that any law which we might pass upon this subject should be clear and definite and explicit in its terms; that it should, item by item, in plain, unambiguous English phrase, tell the business men of this country what they could and what they could not do. In response to that this bill has been presented.

The Senator from Nevada, in his first discussion of this measure, referring to "unfair competition," made this statement:

> Now, then, the question is what unfair competition covers. It covers every practice and method between competitors upon the part of one against the other that is against public morals.

Let me repeat that, because I regard it as a gem—

> It covers every practice and method—

That is, every method—

> between competitors upon the part of one against the other that is against public morals, in my judgment, or is an offense for which a remedy lies either at law or in equity.

So that the meaning of the term "unfair competition" is not to be arrived at by consulting the decisions of the courts or the law writers. It goes beyond that. It not only includes an offense for which a remedy lies either at law or in equity, but, according to the view of the Senator from Nevada, it includes every other practice that is against public morals—a pretty broad category.

The Senator, later along, said:

> My individual opinion is that an interlocking directorate would come under this provision.

How, in the name of heaven, an interlocking directorate, in and of itself, could be regarded as unfair competition I do not know; but we have the statement of the Senator from Nevada—who is the author of this bill, and whose interpretation of it will be given great weight by the trade commission hereafter—that it does include interlocking directorates.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish the quotation, and then I will yield to the Senator.

> My individual opinion is that an interlocking directorate would come under this provision with reference to unfair competition. If an interlocking directorate were used for the purpose of creating a community of interest between two or three or four corporations, that would make them more powerful in their competition with an individual competitor; and I wished the test to be not simply the fact that there were common directors in numerous corporations, but the fact that the creation of that common directorate involved oppression to the independent concern, and thus involved unfair competition.

So that "oppression" is to be regarded as unfair competition, whatever meaning may be included within that word.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I observe that what the Senator has read since I first rose explains what I intended to state, namely, that a mere interlocking directorate would not necessarily constitute unfair competition, but an interlocking directorate created between two corporations with a view to substantially lessening or eliminating competition would do so.

The Senator objects to the term "public morals" or "good morals" as a test. I think it is a very good test. I think there are certain practices that shock the universal conscience of mankind, and the general judgment upon the facts themselves would be that such practices are unfair.

I do not see much difficulty, when you appeal to the conscience of mankind, in determining what is fair and what is unfair in business practices. I think almost every well-regulated mind can determine it, particularly where you get together five men of capacity and learning and experience and present to them the facts regarding a certain business practice. I see no difficulty about such an organization determining what is fair and what is unfair, and determining it in such a way as to satisfy the universal judgment of mankind, except possibly the parties interested.

I claim, then, that that is a definite standard if the practice is against good morals and against public morals and tends to the injury of a competitor unfairly. Then, as to the numerous other things to which an action of tort or an action in equity to restrain can lie, it seems to me where those actions involve competition, where there would be a cause of action by the individual against his competitor, almost all those would be included in the term "unfair competition."

If we were to attempt to enumerate the numerous fraudulent practices which constitute unfair competition, we would be just as much at sea as if we endeavored to state distinctly every series of facts that by any possibility of human experience could constitute fraud. Something must be left to human judgment; something must be left to human conscience in the determination of these questions; and when you have organized a tribunal in such a way that it is composed of men of skill and education and training and experience and character, you get the machinery for the establishment of proper rules and standards.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think I may say without offense to the Senator from Nevada that his idea seems to be that philosophic reflections about things in general can be written into a statute and made good law. I think a statute must depend upon something more definite than that. The Senator has added now, however, another line of cases which come under the description of "unfair competition"—in fact, two or three others that may come under the term—in addition to those that he has already stated—for example, anything which shocks the conscience of mankind. I wonder if the Senator thinks that a statute in those terms would be a good statute—that "anything which shocks the conscience of mankind is hereby declared to be unlawful and punishable by fine and imprisonment"? If "unfair competition" means that, it is less definite than I have ever imagined it to be.

But the Senator proceeded at a later time and stated:

> There are numerous practices tending toward monopoly that may not come within the provisions of the antitrust law and amount to a monopoly or to monopolization. We want to check monopoly in the embryo.

So that according to the view of the Senator from Nevada there are included within the term "unfair competition," first, all violations of the antitrust laws, including even wrongs which may arise from interlocking directorates and intercorporate relationships; second, it includes, apparently, any acts which affect a competitor for which a remedy now lies either at law or in equity; third, it includes all other acts affecting a competitor that are against public morals and, I may add now, that "shock the conscience of mankind," though they may be, under existing laws, quite legal.

That is the view, very briefly stated, of the Senator from Nevada.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who, I may say, of those who have stood sponsors for this legislation is, in my judgment, the only one who has measurably put coherence into what I regard as a hopelessly incoherent proposition, says:

We have chosen to report a rule for the trade commission in the language which has been suggested, namely, "unfair competition." It is that competition which is resorted to for the purpose of destroying competition, of eliminating a competitor, and of introducing monopoly. That is the "unfair competition" in its broad sense which this bill endeavors to prevent. * * * The unfairness must be tinctured with unfairness to the public, not merely with unfairness to the rival or competitor. * * * We are not simply trying to protect one man against another; we are trying to protect the people of the United States, and of course there must be in the imposture or in the vicious practice or method something that has a tendency to affect the people of the country or be injurious to their welfare. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 25, 1914, pp. 12150–12151.)

That is a coherent statement, although I do not believe it to be a precise limitation of what unfair competition will include. Later along, the Senator from Iowa said:

And the attempt is to go further and make some things offenses that are not now condemned by the antitrust law. That is the only purpose of section 5—to make some things punishable, to prevent some things, that can not be punished or prevented under the antitrust law. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 30, 1914, p. 12454.)

There may be unfair competition which does not constitute restraint of trade. Unfair competition must usually proceed to great lengths and be destructive of competition before it can be seized and denounced by the antitrust law. In other cases it must be associated with, coupled with, other vicious and unlawful practices in order to bring the person or the corporation guilty of the practice within the scope of the antitrust law. The purpose of this bill in this section and in other sections which I hope will be added to it, is to seize the offender before his ravages have gone to the length necessary in order to bring him within the law that we already have. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 2, 1914, p. 12622.)

But we propose to do one thing more. We propose to make it an offense. We propose to make it unlawful for any corporation, or any person, indeed, to practice unfair competition, and wherever the practice of unfair competition has not reached a point that constitutes a violation of the antitrust law, then we intend to do what we can to maintain fair, full, free competition through the intervention of the trade commission. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 2, 1914, p. 12625.)

Now, I call attention to those statements of the Senator from Iowa not for the purpose of criticizing them but for the purpose of showing the irreconcilable conflict which exists between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Nevada as to the meaning of the term "unfair competition."

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has still a different idea of its meaning, which in many respects is at war with the view of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Nevada. The Senator from Arkansas said:

The term "unfair competition" in trade will embrace every practice which may be held by a court to be unjust, inequitable, or dishonest; and when Congress legislates on this subject I can see no reason for limiting the statute to one or two practices, when there are many which are equally objectionable. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 25, 1914, p. 12153.)

He quoted in that connection from the work on Words and Phrases, volume 8. These are the quotations which he read, and I invite the attention of the Senate to them because they state what I understand to be the meaning of "unfair competition":

With respect to articles placed upon the market for sale it is only—

Mark the word "only"—

it is only when the one article is dressed so as to represent the other and to deceive a proposing purchaser as being that other that there can be said to be a case of "unfair trade." (Sterling Remedy Co. v. Eureka Chemical & Manufacturing Co. (U. S.), 80 Fed., 105, 108; 25 C. C. A., 314.)

Again, he cited:

The doctrine of unfair competition in trade rests on the proposition that equity will not permit anyone to palm off his goods on the public as those of another. Unfair competition in trade as distinguished from infringement of trade-marks does not involve the violation of any exclusive right to the use of trade-marks or symbols. The word may be purely descriptive and the mark or symbol indicative only of style, size, shape, or quality, and as such open to the public. Yet there may be unfair competition in trade by an improper use of such mark or symbol.

That is a quotation from Ninety-fourth Federal Reporter, page 656. And, again, he quoted:

The term "unfair competition in trade" includes the simulation by defendant of the packages of plaintiff, putting up and selling packages of the same general appearance as those of the plaintiff. The court will only interfere to protect the plaintiff and the public and for the suppression of unfair and dishonest competition when "the resemblance is such that it is calculated to deceive and does, in fact, deceive the ordinary buyer making his purchases under the ordinary conditions which prevail in the conduct of the particular traffic to which the controversy relates. (T. B. Dunn Co. v. Trix Manufacturing Co., 63 N. Y., Supp. 333, 335; 50 App. Div., 75; Cong. Rec., June 25, 1914, p. 12153.)

That I understand to be, according to the decisions and the law writers, the meaning of "unfair competition." I have already stated it briefly in the remarks that I submitted to the Senate a day or two ago.

But the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] upon a later occasion ignored these definitions that he had read to us from the law books and began to draw definitions of "unfair competition" from the economists, and he quoted from Mr. William S. Stevens, of Columbia University. He said:

Mr. William S. Stevens, of Columbia University, in an article called to my attention by Congressman STEVENS of New Hampshire, who introduced this provision in the House, discusses the subject of "unfair competition" from an economic point of view—

Not from a legal point of view. We have the words "unfair competition" to be considered from the legal point of view—from the economic point of view, according to the Senator from Arkansas, and from the ethical point of view, according to the Senator from Nevada—from an economic point of view, and classifies, according to their elementary characteristics, 11 forms of "unfair competition," as follows. I read now from his article on page 283 of the Political Science Quarterly for June, 1914:

"1. Local price cutting.
"2. Operation of bogus 'independent' concerns.
"3. Maintenance of 'fighting ships' and 'fighting brands.'
"4. Lease, sale, purchase, or use of certain articles as a condition of the lease, sale, purchase, or use of other required articles.
"5. Exclusive sales and purchase arrangements.
"6. Rebates and preferential contracts.
"7. Acquisition of exclusive or dominant control of machinery or goods used in the manufacturing process.
"8. Manipulation.
"9. Black lists, boycotts, white lists, etc.
"10. Espionage and use of detectives.
"11. Coercion, threats, and intimidation."

The Senator from Arkansas proceeds:

The terms used fairly define without detailed discussion the various practices thus classified, and undoubtedly embrace nearly all—

"Nearly all." Unfortunately they do not embrace all, but according to the view of the Senator from Arkansas they embrace nearly all—of the methods of "unfair competition" now in use. * * *

Unfortunately we are not enlightened as to the residue. So the unfortunate business man, after this act shall have been passed, must not only consult a lawyer, who will in turn consult the law books in order to ascertain whether or not the thing he intends to do is a valid and proper thing under the law, but he must retain an economist. The value of the services of economists will go up. Each of these great business concerns, in addition to carrying a lawyer on the pay roll, must carry an economist in order to determine what is unfair competition according to the view of the economist. In addition to that he must employ probably by the year also somebody skilled in ethics, who must advise him from time to time whether or not the thing that he proposes to do is ethical.

The Senator from Arkansas proceeds:

Nearly all normal business men can distinguish between "fair competition" and "unfair competition." Efficiency is generally regarded as the fundamental principle of the former—efficiency in producing and in selling—while oppression or advantage obtained by deception or some questionable means is the distinguishing characteristic of "unfair competition." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 27, 1914, p. 11231.)

According to the view of the Senator from Arkansas, therefore, unfair competition will consist of the act of palming upon the public the goods of the offender as the goods of somebody else, which is the legal meaning of the expression. It will also include within it everything which the economist regards as unfair competition, and also any act which normal business men might deem inconsistent with efficiency in producing and in selling.

Now, those are the views of these three Senators with reference to the meaning of this expression. But the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who also ardently supports this bill, has his view as to the meaning of unfair competition. He said:

Courts have always recognized the customs of merchants, and it is my impression that under this act the commission and the courts will be called upon to consider and recognize the fair and unfair customs of merchants—

So we have another test, the fair and unfair customs of merchants must be considered—manufacturers and traders, and probably prohibit many practices and methods which have not heretofore been clearly recognized as unlawful.

Every man in his own business knows when a competitor is pursuing unfair methods.

Sometimes it is the case that he may know; sometimes he may suspect that unfair methods are being used, when in fact they are not. That is my suggestion, not the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware.

Every professional man knows when a competitor is guilty of unfair, unprofessional, and unethical conduct. It may be that heretofore we have been satisfied to allow only the usual punishment to come upon such persons as the violation of the ethics of a profession or a business in time naturally brings; but it is undoubtedly true that sentiment in this country has come to the point where it will, if it can, by law prohibit, prevent, make unlawful, and punish unfair practices in competitive business. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 3, 1914, p. 11593.)

So that according to the view of the Senator from Delaware unfair competition would include all customs of merchants which were in violation of the ethics of a profession or a business.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], differing in many respects from all his colleagues upon this matter, announces his view of what is meant by unfair competition, and says:

Competition is unfair when it resorts to methods which shut out competitors who by reason of their efficiency might otherwise be able to continue in business and prosper. Without the use of unfair methods no corporation can grow beyond the limits imposed upon it by the necessity of being as efficient as any competitor. The mere size of a corporation which maintains its position solely through superior efficiency is ordinarily no menace to the public interest. * * *

The Sherman Antitrust Act does not become effective until a monopoly is full grown, in full panoply, so that you can prove to the court that it is a monopoly and is in restraint of trade; but if the proposed trade commission has its attention called to some unfair method of competition it can immediately investigate, and if it decides that it is unfair competition and may lead to monopoly or restraint of trade it may prohibit it.

If anything is going on which unchecked may lead to monopoly or restraint of trade, it is to be included within the term "unfair competition."

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield in just a moment. I will yield to the Senator as soon as I complete this statement:

And then the court will come in and put that prohibition into effect. * * *

The Sherman Act applies only to restraint of trade by a combination and to monopolization of commerce. Unfair competition is a means of restraining or of monopolizing trade. But there may be some doubt as to whether the mere use of an unfair method, without more, by a corporation of no conspicuous size, would be held to fall within the scope of the Sherman Act. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 15, 1914, p. 12146.)

So that, according to the view of the Senator from New Hampshire, the term "unfair competition" includes a means of restraining or monopolizing trade, which may now be forbidden by the Sherman law.

Second, methods which fall short of being a violation of the Sherman law but which the proposed trade commission may determine may lead to monopoly or restraint of trade; and Third, any other acts which interfere with efficiency.

Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Referring to what the Senator just said with reference to unfair competition, I should like to ask a concrete question. Suppose a corporation set up in the manufacturing of grain drills, which corporation had been fairly prosperous, with business improving, and had made a large quantity of drills; the demand in a large measure ceases, and in order to meet their obligations they must sell them for less than the cost—would that be regarded as unfair competition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] could probably enlighten the Senator from Georgia about that.

Mr. WEST. I should like to have the Senator's view.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I do not know. This trade commission will evolve from their inner consciousness some view of that matter, I presume.

Mr. WEST. I will say to the Senator if it does, I can see where the bill would work a hardship on the corporation of limited means and yet allow the large corporation, the corporation of ample means, to go on and exist, because it could hold its grain drills and tide over the general stagnation in business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. While the question was not put to me I can not allow it to go without a suggestion. There is no element of unfairness whatever in the transaction suggested by the Senator from Georgia. It has never been intimated by any writer or any court with which I am familiar that the transaction which he describes would be regarded as unfair competition or unfair in any way.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will allow me, it is admitted that when the Standard Oil Co. goes into cities and sells kerosene below the price of production it is engaging in unfair competition. Might it not mean that for doing that sort of business, as I suggested a few moments ago, they could be haled before this commission, the commission saying that they were selling their output below the cost of production?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not conceive that a manufacturer selling agricultural implements under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Georgia could be brought before the commission or could be charged with unfair competition. That illustrates how necessary it is to use the general term instead of attempting to denounce a particular practice.

If the Standard Oil Co., doing business throughout the United States, should attempt to crush a competitor in a particular locality—a competitor who had come into existence for the purpose of honestly carrying the trade—by putting down the price of its commodity in that locality, and at the same time maintaining a higher price in other localities, that would be a very clear instance of unfair competition. It is not a theory either, because it is a practice or was a practice which the Standard Oil Co. for years imposed upon its competitors, and through it did drive out a great many worthy rivals.

While I am on my feet I desire to say that I understood the Senator from Utah to commend in high terms the recommendation of the President with respect to defining each instance of wrongdoing that we had become familiar with, and that we ought to prohibit that particular thing. I believe that that is possible to do with regard to some things. It is not possible to do with regard to a great many. If the Senator from Utah will examine section 2 of the bill that has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, he will see some of the difficulties in trying to prevent a particular practice. Take the case of a discrimination in price that I have just suggested to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST]. We all recognize that there are circumstances in which to discriminate in price between buyers and between localities is the most effective means of crushing competition; but if the Senator from Utah will attempt to put in the form of a law a prohibition against that practice, he will encounter a great deal more difficulty than he has encountered in fully understanding some of the definitions that have been proposed for unfair competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I concede the correctness of what the Senator from Iowa has said. It is an exceedingly difficult thing, because it is true that certain acts committed by corporations under some circumstances ought to be denounced by the law and under wholly different circumstances ought not to be; but we do know that there are certain practices that, with the exceptions that could be, I think, enumerated, are bad. For example, I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Iowa and with other Senators as to the vice of the interlocking directorates. It has resulted in great abuses, and, so far as Congress has control over the subject—that is, in so far as it relates to interstate commerce—it is a practice that ought to be forbidden; and yet there may be, as, for example, in the case of banks—I am not going into it at any length—but there may be cases there where there ought to be an exception made. Intercorporate stockholding has resulted in abuses. We would have to draft the language covering these practices with some care. There are certain specific things which are done by corporations and by traders in interstate commerce which ought to be forbidden, but, in my view of it, they ought to be specifically forbidden, so that the business man may know what he can do. We should not crowd everything of an immoral character or of an unethical character into some vague phrase which will simply involve the business men of the country in a greater degree of uncertainty than that which now exists.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Utah; but even the simple case of preventing interlocking directorates is not so easy of solution as many people imagine. What we desire is to keep competitive corporations, or corporations that ought to be competitive, really independent of each other. It is easy enough to say that a man shall not be at the same time a member of the board of directors of two corporations which do a competitive business, but somebody will have to define "competitive." I suppose it is not so hard to define "competitive" as it is to define "unfair," but it is only a little less difficult. There is the widest difference of opinion with regard to the elements that constitute competition in business. When we have made that simple prohibition, we are then bound to create some tribunal to determine whether the two corporations of which the person is a common member are in fact competitive.

We must take into account the location and nature of the business. When we come to consider even that little thing the Senator from Utah will perceive how complicated any regulation of commerce is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, what the Senator from Iowa has just said emphasizes, in my own mind, a view which I expressed the other day, and that is that the congressional mind is not at this moment sufficiently instructed upon this question to pass fair and wise and intelligent legislation. Neither one of these bills ought to be passed at this session of Congress. I predict—and it is always an unsafe thing to predict—but I venture to predict that if these two bills, the unfair-competition bill and the Clayton bill, shall be passed in their present form indescribable confusion will result to the business world. The problems involved have not been sufficiently digested. We have had a discussion here in the Senate which has been helpful, I think. We all of us agree that there are evils in the business of this country that ought to be remedied; but now, after this discussion, these bills ought to be laid aside; they ought to be recommitted to the committees of this body in which they originated; and those two committees ought to sit down, probably by a joint subcommittee, and make a thorough investigation of this whole problem. If it takes a year to do it, the matter is of sufficient importance to justify us in doing that. The end of the world is not going to come if these bills are not passed at this session. I think it would be the part of wisdom if the Senate could now stop further consideration of these measures and send them back to the committees to be dealt with as I have indicated.

While I am upon that general subject, Mr. President, I want to say that I am a thorough believer in competition; I believe in the most thoroughgoing competition among rivals in business of all kinds. I may say, however, that competition among railroads is not so important when it comes to the mere matter of charges for service as it is among the producers of commodities, because the railroad is under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission; its charges can be fixed; and so long as the law is as it is, there can be, in reality, no competition in the matter of charges among railroads. There may be very important competition between two parallel lines of railroad with reference to the matter of facilities. One railroad may carry freight more speedily than another; another may furnish better cars for passengers, better accommodations, better facilities. So upon those matters there may be real competition, and such competition ought to be preserved; but the competition among manufacturers, trading and distributing corporations, and others ought to be preserved and ought to be enforced, because, I think, that is the only way in which we can effectually prevent the monopolization of trade.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator. I take no stock whatever in the statement that has been sometimes made by very distinguished gentlemen that mere size is not objectionable. I think that mere size may be exceedingly objectionable.

I think that when any group of men, calling themselves a corporation or a partnership, or anything else, have put together such an enormous amount of capital that they practically dominate the production and trade in some particular article of prime necessity, even though they may be able to furnish it at a less price than it could be furnished by thoroughgoing competition, that that in and of itself is an exceedingly objectionable thing, because primarily it puts an end to opportunity for individual initiative; it is a blow at individualism, upon which, in the last analysis, our civilization has been builded. Therefore I am opposed to these great combinations.

Mr. President, I may go further and say that my own view of it is that there is only one thoroughgoing method of reaching that evil, and that is by passing a law that will be difficult to put into terms of legislation, I grant you—but by passing a law which will make it unprofitable for these combinations to grow beyond a certain size.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has the right idea about it. When the tariff bill was pending he introduced an amendment for which I very cheerfully voted, which proposed to impose a tax upon great corporations graduated in proportion to the amount of their product. For example, here is a great corporation which, we will say, is producing to-day 80 per cent of a given commodity. I think that is unfortunate; I think it is bound to result in an unwise curtailment of individual opportunity, and we shall in the end pay dearly for the very cheapness which may result. If we could pass a law which would say that whenever that corporation was producing—finding out first what the aggregate amount of the entire production would be, $500,000,000 a year, or whatever it may be—that whenever that corporation produced more than $100,000,000, for example, it should be taxed upon the excess at a certain rate; if it produced $150,000,000, the tax should be increased, and increased and increased until finally it would become so burdensome that it would no longer be profitable for a corporation to produce an excessive quantity. By a law of that kind, effectually administered, not for the purpose of collecting taxes but for the purpose of destroying the evil, a power which Congress has exercised time and time again, we could regulate the size of these combinations.

We imposed a tax of 10 per cent upon State bank issues, not for the purpose of the revenue but for the purpose of destroying what we conceived to be an evil. We imposed a tax upon oleomargarine, not for the purpose of collecting revenue or encouraging the trade but for the purpose of destroying what we considered to be an evil. The courts will not inquire as to the purposes of Congress if the law itself upon its face be under some power of the Constitution. In some such way I think the evil that I have spoken of may be reached. I doubt very much whether it can be effectually reached by such measures as we are considering here to-day.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, referring to the matter of competition between railroads, it has been the policy of the Government, acting through the Interstate Commerce Commission, not to allow the ownership of competing lines. If the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rates, what hurt would come to the Government or to the people whom the railroads serve through the ownership of competing lines?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator what I think is the evil, and that is because they compete as to other matters than rates. They compete in the matter of facilities, as I have already illustrated. For instance, here are substantially two parallel lines running between Chicago and Omaha. Of course, those two lines must charge exactly the same amounts for carrying freight or passengers between those two points. We all concede that; so that there can be no competition in that respect, and if that were all there would be no objection, perhaps, to the same company owning both lines; but they compete and compete very materially with one another about other things. If they were owned by the same company, and those were the only two lines, then both of them might cut down their running time; both of them would very likely deteriorate in the facilities which they furnish. It is for that reason, to preserve that sort of competition, which in many aspects is quite as important as competition in the matter of rates, that there ought to be no common ownership of competing lines. With that policy I am in entire accord.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, is the Senator from Utah quite accurate when he says there is no competition between railroads with respect to rates? I have often heard that asserted, but I do not accept it as strictly sound. It is true that competing railroads as to competing points must charge the same rate, but so long as railroads are independent of each other and so long as each of them is at liberty to prescribe for itself its schedule of rates there is competition. Take the case of the Baltimore & Ohio and the Pennsylvania systems. It is entirely competent for the Pennsylvania Railroad to put in whatever rates it sees fit to establish, subject only to the review of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The law does not contemplate that it shall consult either the Baltimore & Ohio, a competitor, or the New York Central Railroad, a competitor, in determining what rates it will establish. Therefore there is a potential competition in theory, and our law is intended to preserve it. I know very well that in practice, when one road thinks of changing its rates between competitive points, there is some sort of conference preceding the change, but that conference is not contemplated by the law, and, indeed, if it proceeds to the extent of creating any obligation on the part of either road to observe the rates that are established by the other it is contrary to the law.

I do not want to enter upon an argument as to whether there ought to be competition in rates, but I do not think it ought to be generally accepted throughout the country that there is no competition in rates, so long as each railroad is at liberty to establish its own rates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I recognize that there is much force in what the Senator from Iowa says; and he would be entirely accurate if the railroad companies were not subject to the regulating power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under the law, however, a railroad company can not change its rates except upon filing its schedule and making it public for a certain time before it goes into effect. It follows from that that in one way or another the various railroads do reach a common opinion about it; and I do not know any law we could pass that would prevent it, for there is such a variety of ways in which it may be done.

A lot of traffic managers interested in roads that are competing more or less with one another get together in a room and one of them says in a casual way: "We are going to make a rate on wheat from such and such a point to such another point of 5 cents a bushel," or whatever it may be. Well, that is notice. If every other railroad is willing to do the same thing, it is accepted silently; but if not another says: "Well, that is a pretty low rate. I think we will put in force a rate of 6 cents a bushel"; and in some mysterious way they finally reach the conclusion that really the fair rate is 5½ cents a bushel. There are so many ways of doing it that I think, in view of the situation, I am accurate in saying that there is no real competition, and there can be no real competition, between railroad companies in the mere matter of charges.

But, Mr. President, I have been led entirely away from the thing I was discussing. I had been undertaking to show the variety of views of the gentlemen who stand sponsor for this bill as to the meaning of the term "unfair competition." If you take them all together now, and make a sort of composite statement of all their views, we shall find that under the term "unfair competition" there is forbidden——

First, every act of passing off one's goods or business for another's. That is the primitive and the primary meaning of the term, and the sole meaning, as I believe.

Second, all methods of competition tending to restraint of trade or monopoly, which are now forbidden by the Sherman law.

Third, substantially all violations of the antitrust laws, including even wrongs arising from interlocking directorates and allied intercorporate directorships.

Fourth, all other acts which the "commission * * * decides * * * may lead to monopoly or restraint of trade," although they may not now be subject to the penalties of the Sherman Act.

Fifth, all other acts affecting a competitor for which "a remedy lies either at law or in equity."

Sixth, all other acts that either affect a competitor and are "against public morals," or that in any way interfere with economic "efficiency," though they may be now quite lawful, and not forbidden by the Sherman law or by any other law.

And I will add a seventh item, which the Senator from Nevada has given us this morning—anything which "shocks the conscience of mankind."

If these Senators who have deeply studied this subject disagree so much among themselves as to what constitutes unfair competition, what is the trade commission going to do? What is the unfortunate business man going to do about it? If he follows the view of the Senator from Iowa, he will run counter to the view of the Senator from Nevada. If he follows the view of the Senator from Nevada, he will run counter to the view of the Senator from Arkansas. If he follows the view of the Senator from Arkansas, he comes into collision with the Senator from Delaware. If he follows them all, he runs up against the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. So he is in rather an unfortunate condition to know what he can do.

I desire now to read from an article written by Mr. A. W. Shaw upon the general subject of this bill. He says, in the course of his article:

> But much of the legislation now proposed as supplementary to the Sherman Act will affect noncombatants. The average business man will be policed by the methods for regulating unfair business.
> Many of these methods do not give proper consideration to his everyday work. One section of the Newlands bill decidedly suggests government by suspicion. It assumes all business guilty until shown to be innocent. Its proposal for broadcast annual reports burdens the innocent with the cost of searching out the guilty.
> If Congress were to pass a law forcing every citizen to go to court once a year on a sort of day of judgment, explain his work against the criminal code and finally justify himself or stay in a cell, there would probably be a revolution. Most certainly the courts would be so occupied investigating the innocent that the guilty might escape. Still the proposed antitrust legislation provides that business men go through a procedure similar in principle. From every corporation of whatever size engaged in interstate commerce a detailed annual report of its acts and practices is provided for.
> An unfair business with a full treasury—

Now, mark—

> An unfair business with a full treasury does not view with alarm the cost of preparing reports for the Government, but the average business man must figure to dollars and cents the work involved.
> The majority of the 100,000 corporations which might be affected are the bread and butter of business men. It will average to cost each at least $200—$20,000,000 out of the net profits of the going concerns of the country, just when rising costs are most troublesome.

I think the Senator from Nevada will probably doubt that last statement—that rising costs are just now most troublesome—because I know that he and his colleagues promised that we should be no longer troubled with rising costs:

> If the reports are not complete enough to cost at least this amount, they will be inadequate. Thus, from the practical viewpoint, an indirect legislative problem is summed up as a direct tax on the average business and stated as a dollars-and-cents cost that measures work to be done and work to be paid for from sales. And $20,000,000 is an exceedingly conservative estimate; executives' supervision and bookkeepers' wages alone can eat up $200 in no time.
> If the reports are to be of full value to the Government, uniform accounting methods must be used. It took millions to install uniform accounting in the railroad offices—

I may interpose there to say that in dealing with railroads we are dealing with a single kind of business, in which the problem of providing for uniform accounts is a very simple one. This bill undertakes to deal with corporations of vast number, engaged in a multiplicity of activities, where in many instances uniform reports would be a practical impossibility—> and there the different companies faced similar problems. The cost of unifying the varying accounting practices of business concerns handling activities as diversified as the roster of the Nation's market list is little short of prohibitive.

> Having secured reports from the hundred thousand corporations, at a cost exceeding $20,000,000, a trade commission would be in danger of strangulation from the flood of resulting work. To analyze and study the reports can not fail to take the entire time of many experts and directors. The results they secure will not hasten court procedure and can not supply more than a roundabout means for searching out actual violators of the antitrust laws.
> When the average business man looks at this proposed antitrust legislation he sees two needs: First, protection from business pirates operating in violation of the rules of fair competition; and, second, a method of punishing unfair business of this type by a plan which will not burden the man who operates in strict conformity with the law. He believes that the broad principles laid down in the Sherman Act, if efficiently enforced under the rules of unfair competition already worked out by the courts, satisfy these needs. He looks with suspicion upon legislation which condemns specific practices as unfair competition, because he fears that, without enlarging his real protection, the language employed will serve to render of doubtful legality certain well-established and legitimate trade usages not condemned by the Sherman Act.
> He wants some sort of an instrument that will apply the Sherman Act in a manner which makes justice prompt. He has no objection to—in most instances he wants—a constructive commission which will hold public hearings as the result of complaints of high Federal officials or concerns that believe themselves aggrieved. He urges that this commission be given the power to instigate action against firms and individual business men it believes to be violating our laws.
> But the administration needs clearly to recognize the difference between the average business and unfair business and so shape legislation in practical detail as in principle that from the seed of bad practices which certain "big" businesses have sown the average business man of this country will not reap a crop of expensive details and cumbersome impediments.

Further on he says:

> In his turn the business man must assume a wider sphere of action and give more of his time to external problems, including the Government's plans. He needs at Washington a department to consult rather than to fear. It has been suggested that the trade commission be given power to tell when the ice is thin, to determine in advance what specific practices are or are not in violation of the antitrust laws. But the average business man is not interested in testing thin ice. He desires specific assistance that will help him to stand, regardless of the thickness of the ice—usable, profit-bringing, down-to-the-ground assistance, such as the Department of Agriculture gives the farmer. This means separating the Government's accusatory functions for controlling business from the Government's constructive and advisory functions for helping business. The trade commission now proposed can not legally undertake constructive work of this type.
> The Department of Commerce as it stands is a composite of policing and assistance, of upbuilding and suspicion. It raises fish, measures boats, and keeps the lighthouses going at the same time it is policing business, investigating the clothing industry, and taking the census. There is no question of the high ideals of those in charge of the Department of Commerce. In the department now, headed as it is by a man who has successfully directed large business enterprises, conditions are, indeed, unusually favorable. But it is a very serious question whether or not it will ever be possible to crowd from the present group of diverse and unrelated activities much constructive work helpful to the business man.

Mr. President, I had occasion the other day to call attention to some laws of a vague character which have met the condemnation of the courts; and, among other things, I referred to a Chinese law which I thought had been before the Senator from Nevada when he drew this bill. I do not understand that he has admitted that charge, but he has not denied it; and I therefore take the liberty of reiterating that he must have had that Chinese law before him. I think, however, he had another law before him as well.

During the French Revolution some very peculiar laws were passed. They seemed to lose sight of the distinction between the legislative and the judicial power. Their laws were couched usually in the rather indefinite phrase of Jean Jacques Rousseau and similar philosophers. To put them into operation required not so much an act of judgment as it did an edict on the part of the tribunals which were charged with their administration.

I am inclined to think that the Senator from Nevada in some way obtained that law which was passed during the French Revolution, and is denominated the "22 Prairial," which means, as I understand, the law of June 10, 1794. It is true that the law to which I am going to call attention is difficult to find. It is not, so far as I have been able to examine the matter, to be found in the ordinary historical works. This copy was given to me by a gentleman who happened to be in Paris, digging into the musty records of that period, and who discovered it. He was a scholar of ripe learning, who delighted in research; and, happening to find this among those musty records, he copied it and gave me this copy.

The law was passed, as I have said, on June 10, 1794. Article 1 provides:

The revolutionary tribunal shall have a president and 4 vice presidents, a public accuser, 4 assistant public accusers, and 12 judges.

It was a more ambitious organization than that proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

2. The jurors shall consist of the number of 50.

The Senator from Nevada has seen fit to reject that part of the law. He has provided for no jurors, of the number of 50 or of any other number.

3. The different functions shall be exercised by the following-named citizens:

President, Dumas; vice presidents, Coffinhal, Sellier, Naulin, Ragmey.

The Senator has not gone so far as to name the gentlemen who shall compose this commission. He might well have done so.

Public accuser, Fouquier; assistants, Gribauval, Royer, Liendon, Givois.

Then in this law follow the names of the judges and the 50 jurors—they were named, too.

The revolutionary tribunal will be divided into sections composed of 12 members; that is to say, 3 judges and 9 jurors, which jurors can not judge in less number than 7.

Now, notice the simple, comprehensive character of the statement which I am about to read and which the Senator from Nevada, in a general way, must have had in mind:

4. A revolutionary tribunal is instituted to punish the enemies of the people.

But they went further than the Senator from Nevada. They defined what should constitute the enemies of the people:

5. The enemies of the people are those who seek to destroy public liberty, either by force or by ruse.

They not only dealt with the enemies of the people, but they went further:

6. The reputed enemies of the people are those who would induce the reestablishment of royalty or seek to debase or dissolve the national convention and the Republican Revolutionary Government, of which this is the center.

Those who would betray the Republic in the command of places and of armies or in all other military functions, carrying on correspondence with the enemies of the Republic, or endeavoring to deprive the armies of their provisions.

Those who seek to interfere with the provisioning of Paris or to cause scarcity of food in the Republic.

Those who aid the projects of the enemies of France, or who favor the escape of conspirators and of the aristocracy—

He need not assist, but let anybody favor the escape of some poor devil of an aristocrat who was in danger of the guillotine and be was an enemy of the people—or in calumniating patriotism—

There is a beautiful phrase, which I commend to the Senator from Nevada—or in calumniating patriotism, either by corruption of the mandates of the people or in abusing the principles of the revolution, of their laws, or of the measures of the Government, by efforts false and perfidious.

I want the Senator to mark that word "perfidious." It will come in very handily some of these days in some legislation. Now notice this:

Those who have deceived the people or the representatives of the people to induce them to take steps contrary to the interests of liberty.

There is no difficulty about enforcing that, I would think, according to the philosophy of the Senator from Nevada.

Those who have sought to induce discouragement by favoring the enterprises of tyrants leagued against the Republic.

Now this:

Those who would spread false news in order to divide or vex the people.

Those who seek to mislead the opinion and to obstruct the instruction of the people, to deprave the manners and to corrupt the public conscience, to hurt the energy and purity of the revolutionary and republican principles, or by arresting progress either by writings counter-revolutionary or insidious—

Anybody who makes a writing that is insidious in character. I feel sure that corporations ought to be compelled by some sort of a law to refrain from putting anything into their writings of an insidious character. That has been overlooked—or by any other machinations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the word "reactionary" occur?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the word "reactionary" was not in the minds of these gentlemen at that time. That is a word of modern evolution.

The contractors of bad faith who compromised the safety of the Republic, and the destroyers of the public fortune, and others comprised in the dispositions of the law of the seventh frimaire.

Those who being charged with public functions abused the service to aid the enemies of the revolution, to vex the patriots, or to oppress the people.

At length all those who are designated in the preceding laws, relative to the punishment of conspirators and counter-revolutionaries.

Now follows this. The Senator from Nevada, unfortunately, has provided for no penalty for this vague offense of "unfair competition." It is made unlawful apparently by way of gentle admonition only. There ought to be a penalty prescribed. This is the penalty which the French Assembly provided:

7. The punishment for all these misdemeanors is death.

8. The necessary proof is every kind of document, either material, or moral, or verbal, or written.

Now, that is something the Senator ought to put into this bill—the necessary proof to hold a corporation responsible for unfair competition, I may interpolate—is every kind of document, either material, or moral, or verbal, or written—

The Senator might have some difficulty in determining just what was a verbal document, but that is the language of this law—which can naturally obtain the assent—

This will commend itself, I know, to the Senator's philosophic mind—which can naturally obtain the assent of every just and reasonable mind.

That is the test. That is the rule of evidence.

The rule of judgment is the conscience of the jurors enlightened by the love of country—

That is a beautiful and comprehensive test, a very good test, to be sure, but rather difficult of application—

by the love of country, their intention, the triumph of the Republic, and the ruin of its enemies.

A beatific state of mind for a juror to decide a case in. The test is to be his love of country and the triumph of the Republic and the ruin of its enemies. That is the rule of judgment.

The procedure—

Which is delightfully simple—

The procedure, the simple means which good sense indicates to the conscience of truth in the forms which the law determines.

However, that was a little too broad. They had narrower notions than the Senator from Nevada about this matter. So they said:

It is circumscribed by the following points:

9. Every citizen has the right to seize and to arraign before the magistrates conspirators and counter-revolutionaries. He is held to denounce them from what he knows of them.

10. No person can arraign a prisoner at the revolutionary tribunal except the national convention, committee of public safety, the committee of general security, the representatives of the people, commissioners of the convention, and the public accuser of the revolutionary tribunal.

That is rather a lengthy list of people who are thus brought within the magic circle of circumscription.

11. The constituted authorities in general can not exercise this right without having previously obtained authority of the committee of public safety and the committee of general security.

They are a little circumscribed again.

12. The accused shall be interrogated before the court and in public. The formality of the secret interrogation which precedes is suppressed as superfluous; it can have place only in the particular circumstances where it will be judged useful to the knowledge of truth.

13. If there exists any proof, either material or moral, independent of the testimony—

That ought to go into this bill.

13. If there exists any proof, either material or moral, independent of the testimony, it will not be heard by witnesses unless it appears necessary either to discover some accomplices or for some other greater considerations of public interest.

That is, they are not permitted to consider improper testimony unless it is necessary to do so. If it is necessary to do so, then they may consider it.

14. In the cases where this proof is given the public accuser can call the witnesses who can enlighten justice.

15. All the depositions are made in public, and no written deposition will be received unless it is impossible to bring the witness before the tribunal, and in this case it will be necessary to secure express authority from the committees of public safety and general security.

Those committees on public safety and general security had a pretty large contract on their hands, evidently.

16. The law for the defense of calumniated patriots does not extend to conspirators.

A calumniated conspirator evidently was given short shrift. If he was a calumniated patriot, he could make his defense. You could calumniate a conspirator as much as you pleased, but you had to stop when you came to a patriot.

17. The debates finished, the juries will form their verdict, and the judges will pronounce the penalty in the manner determined by law. The president will charge the jury with clearness, precision, and simplicity. If he presents his charge in an equivocal or inexact manner, the jury can demand that it be expressed in another manner.

18. The public accuser can not on his own authority renew a previous application addressed to the tribunal or where he would have made an arraignment himself in the case where there would have been no matter of an accusation before the tribunal. He will make a written report and motion to the chamber of council, who will pronounce their judgment; but no defendant can be placed beyond judgment before the decision of the chamber has been communicated to the committees of public safety and general security which examined him.

19. There will be made a double register of the persons arraigned before the revolutionary tribunal, one for the public accuser and the other for the tribunal, on which will be inscribed all the names of the defendants.

20. The convention repeals all those preceding laws which are inconsistent with the present laws and extends only the laws concerning the organization of the ordinary tribunals, applying themselves to the crimes of counter-revolution and to the action of the revolutionary tribunal.

21. The report of the committee will be joined to the present decree as instruction.

If I am mistaken in my view that the Senator from Nevada has had this law before him and has become more or less saturated with its precision and its humanity and its lack of arbitrary power, then I commend it to his consideration when he comes to frame amendments to the bill, which I understand are impending to a greater or less extent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. JONES. The question is on the entire substitute, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; on the committee substitute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is an amendment pending as an additional section.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read, Mr. President.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether any business has been transacted under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No business has been transacted under the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to ask the Chair to point us to the rule which requires that business shall be transacted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair quoted the Senator from New Hampshire a few days ago as being in favor of this ruling when he held that business had to intervene.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think bills have been introduced, have they not?

Mr. JONES. I wish to suggest that several Senators were relieved from service on committees, and that certainly is business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Norris	Stone
Brandegee	Johnson	Overman	Sutherland
Bryan	Jones	Owen	Swanson
Camden	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
Catron	Kern	Perkins	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lane	Pomerene	Tillman
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Reed	Walsh
Colt	Lewis	Saulsbury	West
Cummins	Lippitt	Shafroth	White
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Williams
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Hollis	Newlands	Smoot

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES]. He is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the committee, which is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the amendment pending is the additional section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has never been offered to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Some Senator asked that the amendment might be read. It was not read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be a misapprehension. It seems to be in the mind of Senators that they can send an amendment to the desk and have it printed and lie on the table, and that then it is pending before the Senate. It is not pending in that way, and can not pend in that way. The only question that is now pending before the Senate is the substitute offered by the committee. There are a large number of amendments that have been sent up to the desk and printed, but they have never been offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand; but I wanted to know which committee amendment was pending, which substitute, at what page it comes in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the substitute for the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only question that is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And its adoption is equivalent to the passage of the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for a vote upon the amendment which I offered to insert as an additional section—section 11.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada offer it now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer it now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 11. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent or interfere with the enforcement of the provisions of the antitrust acts or the acts to regulate commerce, nor shall anything contained in the act be construed to alter, modify, or repeal the said antitrust acts or the acts to regulate commerce or any part or parts thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, what necessity is there for this amendment? Does anyone think that this committee amendment would affect the Sherman law or modify it, I would ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wondered what is the reason for using this language, if there is no reason given for it, that is all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, an amendment was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] covering this subject. That amendment was divided into two parts. One part has already been adopted, being an addition to section 5, providing that no order made under that section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit under the antitrust acts. That amendment has been adopted. The remaining portion was accepted by the committee as an additional section, and is in the language read at the desk. It is simply for the purpose of absolutely insuring the fact that this bill does not in any way affect or interfere with the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection whatever to it, except that I consider it purely surplusage.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask if this is a committee amendment or a personal amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. When was it adopted by the committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was recommended by the committee at a recent meeting, a week or so ago.

Mr. LIPPITT. Where was that committee meeting held?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was held at the office of the committee in the Senate Office Building.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have another amendment, a committee amendment, to offer, and that is the insertion, in line 9, page 17, after the word "commerce," of the words "relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged."

That amendment is offered in response to the criticism upon the phraseology of subdivision (a) of section 3, made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. As amended it will read as follows:

Subdivision (a) To investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged, and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I may not have understood the amendment correctly as read; but before asking for the rereading of it I will state that it seems to me it does not meet the suggestion raised by the Senator from Utah for this reason: The commerce in which the corporation may be engaged may be both intrastate and interstate, and I do not think the amendment is appropriate. If the corporation is engaged in both intrastate commerce and commerce among the States, then what good does the amendment of the Senator from Nevada do that they shall investigate the practices of the party in relation to the commerce in which it is engaged?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The word "commerce," the Senator will recollect, is defined in lines 14 and 15, on page 13, as follows:

"Commerce" means such commerce as Congress has the power to regulate under the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The commerce there referred to is interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the effect of this amendment is to restrict the investigation of the commission to the practices of a corporation engaged in commerce among the States, I have no objection to it, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be read. It has not been read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the proposed committee amendment, line 9, after the word "commerce" and the comma, insert the words "relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, that would seem to take care of the provisions of subdivision (a) in that particular down to where the insertion is made; but what does the Senator say of the succeeding language and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships? Does the Senator desire to limit it in one particular and leave it unlimited in the other?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The committee is satisfied with that subdivision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will also offer to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "An act to create a Federal trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes."

Mr. GALLINGER. That will come later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on the amendment of the title will come after the bill has been disposed of. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following amendment as section 6 of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it in lieu of section 6?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is another section 6?

Mr. CUMMINS. The other sections are to be numbered consecutively thereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after the amendment already agreed to at that point, in line 22, insert as section 6 the following:

SEC. 6. It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of any other corporation also engaged in commerce if the business of such corporations is naturally and by reason of character and location competitive.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to forbid and prevent such unlawful conditions in commerce in the manner following, to wit:

Whenever it shall have reason to believe that any corporation so engaged in commerce has acquired or is owning, holding, or controlling, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control of any other corporation also engaged in commerce, and that the business of the two or more corporations is naturally and by reason of character and location competitive, it shall issue and serve upon the corporation a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint. If upon such hearing the commission shall find that such corporation has acquired or is holding, owning, or controlling the capital stock, or other share capital, or other means of control or participation in the control of any other corporation contrary to the provisions of this section it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the corporation an order requiring that within a reasonable time, to be stated in such order, that the corporation shall cease and desist from acquiring, owning, holding, or controlling the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or other means of control, or participation in the control of such other corporation or corporations.

The commission may at any time set aside, in whole or in part, or modify its findings or order so entered or made. Any suit brought by any corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the complainant corporation has its principal office or place of business, and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall govern the procedure in such cases.

If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission the corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from the acquisition, owning, holding, or controlling of the whole or any part of the capital stock or other share capital or other means of control or participation in the control of such other corporation or corporations and comply with the order of the commission by bringing itself in such respect into conformity with the law, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in the district court of the United States in any district wherein the defendant corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience to any such order according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity.

All the provisions of the law relating to place and advancements for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply in suits brought under this section: Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect or be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not that amendment covered by section 8 of the antitrust bill reported by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to make some observations in regard to the question just propounded by the Senator from North Carolina. The subject is dealt with——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield if the Senator will wait until I finish my sentence. The subject is dealt with in the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee known as the Clayton bill. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I wish to say that a number of the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with the very valued assistance of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], have redrafted section 5 of this bill. Not intending to take the time of the Senator from Iowa now, I ask that the section as redrafted may be ordered printed and lie on the table, to be called up at a later hour in the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I presume the Senator from Ohio did not wish to give the impression that the amendment as drawn has been as yet accepted by the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I had no such intention. I simply stated that the amendment was drawn up after a conference held by a number of the members of the committee and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Lest there be any misunderstanding at all about it, I desire to say that the amendment, as redrafted, has not as yet been acted upon by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Ohio offer the amendment in his own name?

Mr. POMERENE. I simply give notice of my intention to offer it at a later hour.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I said, the subject of the amendment which I have just offered is embraced in the Clayton bill. I have offered the amendment for two reasons: First, because I think the legislation upon that subject ought to be a part of the bill now under consideration rather than a part of the Clayton bill; second, because I am not at all satisfied with the provisions of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

It will be observed that I have excepted from the operation of this amendment banks, banking institutions, and common carriers.

Mr. OVERMAN. So has the Judiciary Committee in the bill reported by them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have excepted the latter because I believe that the provisions of the bill with regard to common carriers ought to be a part of the interstate-commerce act, and I intend to offer an amendment in substantially similar terms applicable to common carriers when we reach the consideration of what is known as the railroad securities bill, which is a revision of certain parts of the interstate-commerce law.

With regard to banks and banking institutions, whatever changes we make in the law with regard to them, in my judgment, should be made in the banking and currency law, and the enforcement of such provisions should be committed to the Federal Reserve Board.

The difference between the provision of the Clayton bill and the provisions of the amendment which I have just offered, so far as the substantive law is concerned, I mean—entirely apart from the commission and the procedure before the commission and the jurisdiction of the courts and the procedure in the court—lies principally in two things. I will be compelled to take up for consideration in a degree the provisions of the Clayton bill in order to indicate in what respects my amendment differs from the Clayton bill. The subject is covered in section 8 of the measure to which I have just referred. Section 8 provides:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce.

I pause in the reading to point out the first difference. It will be seen that the Clayton bill renders unlawful the future acquisition of stock or of share capital. It does not attempt to regulate those instances in which corporations have already acquired and now hold the capital stock of competitive corporations. I regard that as a fatal weakness. The people of this country will not be satisfied with a mere prohibition against acquisitions of stock made by these corporations in the future; it is the existing condition of which they complain. They desire to be relieved of some of the hardships, some of the wrongdoing which grows out of the absorption by one corporation of the stock of another engaged in a competitive business. If we are to withhold our hands and make no effort to readjust the onerous and hard conditions which have grown up we might almost as well abandon all regulation of the subject.

Mr. President, it must not be assumed that I am suggesting that there should be a confiscation of any stock now held by any corporation contrary to the provisions of my amendment. My contention is that corporations which apparently are independent, but which are, in fact, inter-related in the way I have described, ought to divorce themselves and pursue an independent course; that if a corporation owns the stock of another engaged in similar business, within some reasonable time, which I have provided for in my amendment, to be prescribed by the commission, the corporation shall sell or otherwise dispose of that stock, the holding of which constitutes a violation of the principle we are endeavoring to announce and enforce. There can be no hardship to a corporation in requiring it to observe that principle. If it is against public policy that a corporation shall in the future control another through the medium of the ownership of its capital stock, it is likewise against public policy that a corporation which now holds this means of control shall continue to hold it.

I put the question to the Senate by my amendment so sharply that it can not be misunderstood, and I intend that the people of this country shall understand the difference between a provision which simply prohibits future acquisitions of stock under such circumstances and a provision which compels a corporation holding the stock of another corporation in violation of the principle established to part with that capital stock and to bring itself into harmony with the policy that we are now establishing.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator recognizes, does he not, that both the trade commission bill and the Clayton bill proceed upon the theory, expressed in both of them now, that no part of the Sherman law shall be amended or modified by anything contained in either or both of them?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. CHILTON. Does the Senator not think that holding companies and the owning of the stock of one corporation by another so as to lessen competition already come within the purview of the Sherman law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator does not agree to that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. CHILTON. If such practices restrict trade or lessen trade or create or tend to create monopoly, do they not come within the Sherman law?

Mr. CUMMINS. They then do.

Mr. CHILTON. Well, does the Senator think we have any jurisdiction over such a practice, if it does not restrain trade?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably we have—that is, from my standpoint.

Mr. CHILTON. I merely wanted to get the Senator's position.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have no constitutional or moral right to confiscate the property of a person or of a corporation, nor would any Senator tolerate the suggestion; but we have the right to prescribe the conditions upon which a corporation shall engage in commerce among the States, and one of those conditions ought to be that the corporation is not holding the stock or other means of control of another corporation with which it is ostensibly in competition.

In response further to the Senator from West Virginia, I may say that the mere purchase on the part of one corporation of the stock of another engaged in competition is not a violation of the antitrust law. There may be a dozen or 20 corporations engaged in the same business, and it is the commonest thing known that 1 of these 20 shall own the stock of 1, 2, or 3 of the others; it is a favorite method of consolidation, of unifying the control; but that does not establish restraint of trade; that does not establish monopoly, although the practice is plainly opposed to public policy. I have now named the first respect in which my amendment differs from the provision in the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The second respect is that in the Clayton bill the standard set up as the test of illegality is this:

Where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Of course the latter, Mr. President, is purely superfluous, because whenever there is anything done that creates a monopoly in any line of commerce it falls within the prohibition of the antitrust law; but in order to make the acquisition even in the future unlawful, the Government must show that the effect of the acquisition is either to eliminate or to substantially lessen competition. While every sensible man knows that the ownership by one corporation of the stock of another does eliminate to a great extent competition and does substantially lessen competition, it will be practically impossible in 99 cases out of 100 for the Government to show that the effect of the stockholding upon the part of the one corporation destroys competition between it and another corporation. It is one of those things that are not susceptible of proof; and if I were not well assured of the patriotic purposes of the men who used that expression in the original bill as it came from the House, I could not resist the belief that its use was intended to delude the people of the country into the belief that we are doing something for them, when, as a matter of fact, we are doing nothing at all.

I regard the proposal as it is now in the Clayton bill as a "gold brick." It can have no beneficial effect; it will be innocuous and its enforcement will, in my judgment, never be attempted; for if Senators will simply busy their minds in attempting to imagine or in attempting to forecast what proof the Government must bring forward in order to show that the ownership of the stock of one corporation by another has actually lessened competition between those two corporations, they will perceive at once how difficult if not impossible the task will be. I can not think that Senators desire to approve the custom of business through which one corporation holds the stock of another, the two corporations being engaged in the same kind of commerce or traffic. Why should one corporation hold the stock of another when they are engaged in a common business? I challenge an answer to that question. I want somebody who believes in the provision of the Clayton bill to answer the question, Why should one corporation be permitted to hold the stock of another?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. In no sense accepting the challenge of the Senator, I want to call his attention to the discussion in which the Senator engaged in the Committee on the Judiciary. In the first place, the Senator will recall that the committee discussed very fully the constitutional difficulty in the way of going that far under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. The Senator will further recall the fact that it was shown before the committee—and there is no doubt about it being true—that some of the States specifically authorize one corporation to hold the stock of another; for instance, the State of West Virginia under its laws specifically authorizes one corporation to hold the stock of another. It is recognized that whatever may be the construction of the Sherman antitrust law upon that point and whatever may be our opinion as to the manner in which it has been enforced, the fact is that such holdings exist.

This legislation is in part experimental. Everybody recognizes that we are going out into a field to try to give relief to the people in obedience to the promise of political parties and in answer to what seems to be a public demand growing out of a danger to commerce. Now, we find this condition: There are hundreds of thousands of corporations, and it has been proved by the evidence taken that many of these corporations probably own the stock of other corporations. That is a condition which has grown up; whether right or wrong, it is here.

In the first place, we had to consider the possible disturbance of business involved in making a rule at least of doubtful propriety. It is very doubtful whether or not we have the constitutional power to go into the States and say, "Notwithstanding the fact that you have a law here which permits a corporation engaged in business to own the stock of another corporation, we say by a law of Congress that that shall not be permitted, and, notwithstanding the fact that you have built up a business here, notwithstanding the fact that you have acquired a large amount of property, we are going to say from now on not only that you shall not own the stock of another corporation but that you must unscramble this condition which has grown up under the laws of the State and under the permission of the Federal Government."

The general rule is that all laws shall have a prospective effect. It is very unusual for Congress to enact a law reaching a condition which has grown up in the past under authority of law. The usual rule is that laws have a prospective and not a retrospective effect, and we did not think that the reasons urged before the committee were sufficient to make an exception at this time. We thought it very doubtful whether or not we had the power to go as far as does the amendment. In the second place, we thought it very doubtful whether or not it would be best for the country, for all of the people, if it should be done, even if we did have the power. In the third place, we thought it very doubtful whether or not there should be brought about that kind of a conflict between the laws of the States and the regulation of commerce now to be made by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I never heard the constitutional question suggested. I can not believe that there is any real doubt with regard to the power of Congress to prescribe a rule of that character. Otherwise, we have no power to regulate commerce; otherwise, our power to regulate commerce is subordinate to the legislation and sovereignty of the States. The Senator from West Virginia can not doubt our right to say that no monopoly shall exist, even if the law of a State permitted monopoly. Of course the law of a State can not declare what shall be done or not done in interstate commerce. The law of the State is supreme only with regard to its own affairs. It is supreme with respect to its own commerce, but it can not limit or prescribe the extent to which Congress may go in regulating interstate commerce. Upon interstate commerce the power of Congress is as unquestioned and unlimited as is the power of the State with regard to intrastate commerce; and that we can say that it shall be unlawful for any corporation holding the stock of another and competitive corporation to engage in interstate commerce I feel is so certain that it must be accepted as a fundamental proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If that be done, I am in entire accord with the Senator. That is precisely the course which I think this legislation should take. This amendment is one which goes very far toward satisfying my views as to the character of our national antitrust legislation. The principal criticism I have to make of the amendment is that it does not prohibit all corporations engaged in interstate commerce business from holding stock in any other corporation. I do not think a corporation should be permitted to hold stock in any other corporation. It is foreign to the purposes for which it is created and must necessarily lead to the control, or at least to the influencing, of the operations and policy of the corporation in which the stock is held.

Mr. CUMMINS. I go quite as far as the Senator from Colorado. It was the common law. It is now the opinion of the ablest students of the whole subject as they review the wonderful growth of corporate power and the intertwining of corporate interests, so that by accumulating into one corporation the stock, or a part of the stock, of many others a monopoly is easily effected.

I am in favor of absolutely prohibiting any corporation from owning the stock of any other corporation whether competitive or not if the acquiring corporation desires to engage in commerce among the States; but I have not sought to do that in my amendment. I have limited it to those cases in which the two corporations or more are engaged in business that ought to be competitive, and my whole desire is to strengthen the competitive force in the business of the United States.

There can be no reason given for the amendment as limited by the Judiciary Committee except this, that we do not want to further disturb these monopolistic powers, and want to leave them to be dealt with only by the antitrust law. I concede that it leaves them subject to the antitrust law.

I have no apprehension with regard to the alleged disturbance. There are no hundred thousand corporations in this country holding the stock of other competitive corporations. There is not a line in the evidence anywhere that indicates any such thing. There are a great many of them, I agree. Some of the most prominent of them are well known upon the floor of the Senate. I remember hearing just the other day a most graphic story with regard to the International Harvester Co. It had acquired the stock, the means of control, of another and competitive corporation. It permitted the latter corporation to go on and do business as an independent, intending that the public should believe that there was rivalry between the two, and in that way endeavored to compose and alleviate some of the complaints that are not only Nation-wide, but world-wide, against consolidations of that character. Yet under this bill, so far as this amendment is concerned, the International Harvester Co. could continue to hold the stock of these other corporations and continue this course of deception and fraud which characterized its business for a period at least.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. I have no controversy with the Senator as to the great desirability of abolishing the holding company. I think it is a great abuse, and, so far as I am concerned, the Senator knows that he and I would have no controversy whatever on that subject. But, Mr. President, the power of the Congress is limited to interstate commerce; and assuredly the Senator does not mean to say that there has been no controversy as to where the power of the Federal Government shall end and the power of the State shall begin, or, vice versa, where the power of the State shall end and where the power of the Federal Government shall begin.

In every question and in every law, in every discussion of this subject, we have got to meet the fact that we can deal only with interstate commerce. Now, the Senator certainly will recollect the argument that if we can deal with the organization of a corporation we can deal with its plant. If we can deal with its plant we can deal with its men. If we can deal with its men we can regulate their hours of employment. If we can regulate their hours of employment we can say who shall work and who shall not.

In other words, certainly the Senator does not mean to say that the power to regulate interstate commerce goes to the extent of allowing Congress to go down into the States and regulate the hours and conditions of labor and the conditions of employment in the States. In the opinion of many these things would be as much a part of interstate commerce as would be the regulation of the organization of a corporation created by the State, regulated by the State, which must go to the State for its powers and must go to the laws of the State for the charter of its existence, and where it can work, and what it can do.

If we can go into a State and regulate all such affairs of corporations, many contend that we can go still further and can regulate every one of the conditions of employment as well as the conditions and means of manufacture. On that point we did think there was a serious controversy; and to show the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator pause for a moment just at that point?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The argument the Senator has just been making is as potent against what the committee has done as against what I think ought to be done.

If it is not a valid regulation of interstate commerce to say that it shall be unlawful for a corporation engaged in such commerce to hold the capital stock of another corporation; if that can not be done, neither can you say to the corporation: "You shall not in the future acquire capital stock of a corporation engaged likewise in commerce." If that is a matter for State regulation alone, we can neither interfere with it, as has been done in the past, nor can we prevent it if it is attempted in the future.

I never heard our authority in that respect questioned. I have often heard it questioned whether we could regulate hours of labor, and I have heard it questioned whether we could regulate the issues of stock and bonds, and things of that sort; but I never heard it questioned that Congress could lay down any rule that was necessary to preserve the freedom of commerce, to preserve competition in business. The Senator from West Virginia is the first Senator I have ever heard challenge that proposition.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I certainly have heard it questioned in the committee; and I want to call the Senator's attention to this fact:

The language of the Clayton bill confines it to matters as to which there is no doubt about the power of Congress. There can be no question, under the decisions now, as to the power of Congress wherever the act substantially lessens competition or restrains trade. We are following in a beaten path when we go that far.

Mr. CUMMINS. In what beaten path?

Mr. CHILTON. I will ask the Senator what he thinks of this proposition: Suppose it were lawful for a corporation to buy stock in another corporation a year ago; suppose it were lawful under the laws of the United States and under the laws of the States. Could you, by any act now, divest it of that property?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. CHILTON. Could you take from it a vested right?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; we could not.

Mr. CHILTON. Does not that present essentially a constitutional question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. We can not divest them of the property, but we can say to them, "If you do not get rid of that property you can not continue to engage in interstate commerce."

Mr. CHILTON. Is that what the Senator's amendment says?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely what it says.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That it shall be unlawful for a company to continue to engage in interstate commerce if these things are true.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, while I am on my feet, if the Senator will pardon me, upon the other point to which I called his attention——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not want to read it, but I should like to put in the RECORD, simply as the authority for the question which I raised as to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation, a quotation from the decision——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not yield for that purpose. I am perfectly willing that any authority, any case which the Senator has in mind, shall be put in, but——

Mr. CHILTON. Without reading, I mean.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would rather the Senator from West Virginia would put it in in his own time.

Mr. CHILTON. Very well, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. For that would be to put in my argument the argument of some one else. I would be necessarily required then to pause to consider it and answer it if I could.

Mr. President, for these two reasons, which seem to me very grave reasons, I have offered my amendment. I do not intend to debate the matter further. It seems to me the merit of what I have said is so obvious that it ought not to be required of me that I should consume further time to demonstrate its soundness and wisdom. I simply want Senators to feel, as I want the country to know, that when they vote against this amendment and in favor of the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee they are legalizing, in so far as they can, the iniquities of the past.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator is in earnest about this—and I know he is—instead of offering his amendment to the trade commission bill, I think he might amend section 8 of the other bill by adding simply one word or two words, which would accomplish exactly what he wants.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would. It would cover that point.

Mr. OVERMAN. So as to make it read:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall own, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock—

And so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all you have to put in there—the word "own."

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina remembers, I am sure, that in the Judiciary Committee—if I am permitted to speak of it—the amendment he has now outlined was unanimously adopted. There was no dissent whatever. Then, at some time—I did not happen to be present at that time—it was stricken out, and I was amazed when I discovered that the members of the committee had changed their minds in that regard. Still, the amendment just suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, while it would tremendously improve the section, and while it would cure the one defect which we have been discussing, would not remove what I regard as a serious mistake in the standard which is sought to be applied in order to determine whether one corporation can hold the stock of another.

I do not believe there should be put upon the people of this country the burden of proving that ownership on the part of one corporation of stock of another and competitive corporation has the effect of lessening competition between them before any remedy can be administered. You know, every Senator knows, that where one corporation holds the stock of another, and where they are engaged in the same kind of business, it is against public policy, and that does result in destroying competition between them. It may be impossible to prove it. I think in most instances it would be impossible to establish it; but down in our hearts we all know, and the whole American people know, that a relation of that sort does destroy independence of action and that full, complete, and vigorous competition to which we are entitled in the commerce of the country.

I do not intend to pursue my amendment and point out the difference between the method of enforcing the law as shown in the report of the Judiciary Committee and as set forth in the amendment that I have proposed. That question, I assume, will arise upon another amendment. When it does arise I expect to point out my views somewhat fully and express my opinions as to the best procedure, both in the commission and in the courts, for the enforcement of the law. Just now I am concerned only in the two things: First, the escape of all corporations which now hold the stock of their rivals in business; and, second, in requiring the Government to prove that the effect has been to lessen competition before the law declares the relation illegal.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, just at this point I should like permission to put into the RECORD the quotation from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S., 1), being part of the decision of Mr. Justice Lamar, to which I referred during the remarks of the Senator from Iowa, and I did not object that he preferred not to have it made part of his speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In the case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S., 1), Justice Lamar, writing the opinion of the court, says (p. 16):

"The line which separates the province of Federal authority over the regulation of commerce from the powers reserved to the States has engaged the attention of this court in a great number and variety of cases. The decisions in these cases, though they do not in a single instance assume to trace that line throughout its entire length, or to state any rule further than to locate the line in each particular case as it arises, have almost uniformly adhered to the fundamental principles which Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), laid down as to the nature and extent of the grant of power to Congress on this subject, and also of the limitations, express and implied, which it imposes upon State legislation, with regard to taxation, to the control of domestic commerce, and to all persons and things within its limits of purely internal concern.

"According to the theory of that great opinion the supreme authority of this country is divided between the Government of the United States, whose action extends over the whole Union, but which possesses only certain powers enumerated in its written Constitution, and the separate governments of the several States, which retain all powers not delegated to the Union. The power expressly conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce is absolute and complete in itself, with no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution; is to a certain extent exclusively vested in Congress, so far free from State action; is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and can not stop at the external boundary of a State, but must enter into the interior of every State whenever required by the interests of commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States. This power, however, does not comprehend the purely internal domestic commerce of a State which is carried on between man and man within a State or between different parts of the same State.

"The distinction is stated in the following comprehensive language: "'The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the Nation and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself' (p. 195).

"No distinction is more popular to the common mind or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation, the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce, and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 702) is as follows: 'Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities.' If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market?

"The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of the delicate, multiform, and vital interests, interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

* * * * * * *

"This being true, how can it further that object so as to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicated? The demands of such a supervision would require, not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market. These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen; but still there would always remain the possibility—and often it would be the case—that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State, and the interminable trouble would be presented that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined, not by any general or intelligible rule, but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments and more provocative of conflicts between the General Government and the States, and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended, it would be difficult to imagine.

* * * * * * *

"These questions are well answered in the language of the court in the license-tax cases (5 Wall., 462, 470): 'Over this commerce and trade (the internal commerce and domestic trade of the States) Congress has no power of regulation, nor any direct control. This power belongs exclusively to the States. No interference by Congress with the business of citizens transacted within a State is warranted by the Constitution, except such as is strictly incidental to the exercise of powers clearly granted to the legislature. The power to authorize a business within a State is plainly repugnant to the exclusive power of the State over the same subject.'"

In Wilkerson v. Rahrer (140 U. S., 545) the justice, in writing the opinion of the court, says (p. 554):

"The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

"And this court has uniformly recognized State legislation, legitimately for police purposes, as not in the sense of the Constitution necessarily infringing upon any right which has been confided expressly or by implication to the National Government.

"The fourteenth amendment, in forbidding a State to make or enforce any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, did not invest and did not attempt to invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation.

"As observed by Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the court in the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3, 13), the legislation under that amendment can not 'properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by a State to any persons of the equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection.'

"In short, it is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remain with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government, and that in this respect it is not interfered with by the fourteenth amendment. (Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S., 27–31.)

"'Commerce undoubtedly is traffic,' said Chief Justice Marshall, 'but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.' Unquestionably, fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids are subjects of commercial intercourse, exchange, barter, and traffic between nation and nation and between State and State, like any other commodity in which a right of traffic exists, and are so recognized by the usages of the commercial world, the laws of Congress, and the decisions of courts. Nevertheless, it has been often held that State legislation which prohibits the manufacture of spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors within the limits of a State, to be there sold or bartered for general use as a beverage, does not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States or by the amendments thereto. (Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S., 632, and cases cited.) 'These cases,' in the language of the opinion in Mugler v. Kansas (p. 659), 'rest upon the acknowledged right of the States of the Union to control their purely internal affairs, and in so doing to protect the health, morals, and safety of their people by regulations that do not interfere with the execution of the powers of the General Government or violate rights secured by the Constitution of the United States.' The power to establish such regulations, as was said in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1, 203), reaches everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the National Government."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the question presented by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa introduces into the discussion at this time practically the wisdom of the provision made in the Clayton bill to meet the evil to which the amendment is addressed.

It occurs to me that the decision of that question ought to wait until we have the Clayton bill before us for consideration. I do not mean to assert that the subject is not quite as germane to the trade commission bill as it is to the so-called antitrust or Clayton bill; but I think everyone will recognize that in order to arrive at results in this proposed legislation we ought to adhere as closely as we can, consistently with the preparation of proper measures, to the bills which have come to us from the House. I think it would be eminently unwise to transport a whole subject matter from the Clayton bill, for instance, and give it a place in the trade commission bill, separate and apart from the other provisions of the Clayton bill to which it must bear a more or less direct relation.

I would not like to have it understood that, speaking for myself at least, I do not consider as having very great force indeed the suggestions made in this behalf by the distinguished Senator from Iowa. As has been said by him, both of these subjects received consideration by the Judiciary Committee. I do not think I was myself present when the change was made which eliminated the amendment prohibiting the holding as well as the acquisition by a corporation of the stock of a competing company, and I am disposed to believe that the Senator from Iowa was not present—that is my recollection, at least—when final consideration was given to the other feature of the section which has been made subject to his criticism.

I call the attention of the Senator, however, to the fact that the whole purpose of the amendment now offered by him, so far as it is intended to correct what he believes to be defects in section 8 of the Clayton bill, can be met by just a simple change in the language of section 8; and it occurs to me that that would be the advisable course, rather than to inject into this bill the very extensive provisions which are found in the amendment now offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator from Montana is saying, as I have realized the embarrassment of trying to deal with these subjects in two independent bills. The reason I have offered this amendment—and I had hoped, really, that the subject would be considered by the Judiciary Committee or those who are in charge of affairs upon the other side—is this:

I believe that interlocking directorates and the holding of the stock of one corporation by another are two of the great evils that need a remedy. I am sure the Senator from Montana will agree with me about that. If we deal with them in the Clayton bill and commit their enforcement to a trade commission, as the Clayton bill does, what would be our situation if the trade commission bill should not become a law? We would have done, as it seems to me, one of the most ridiculous things that can be imagined of a legislative body.

It is clear to me that these things which are inseparably connected with the trade commission, that depend for their life upon the action of the trade commission, ought to be in the trade commission bill, so that they will all become law together. That seems to be a very logical and reasonable suggestion.

Mr. WEST. Why not consolidate and unify the two into one, then?

Mr. CUMMINS. I answer the Senator from Georgia that I have been from the beginning earnest in the effort to consolidate them. Our committee, the Interstate Commerce Committee, originally voted to report the section that I have just read, not in terms but covering that subject, as a part of this bill as well as that relating to interlocking directorates. I knew that we would be in just the position we now find ourselves if we did not embody all such legislation in one measure. I do not want to be an obstructionist; I want to help bring this legislation into the wisest possible form; but I can not imagine how it would hurt—I can see how it would help—if sections 8 and 9 of the Clayton bill were lifted out of that measure and put into the trade commission bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I would not be prepared to dispute that it might not be as appropriately placed there. Indeed were we called upon originally to draft these measures perhaps we might deem it wise to put it there, but I submit it is simply a question into which bill the subject ought to be treated. It is treated in the Clayton bill as it comes to us, and I can see no good reason now for departing from the consideration of it in connection with that measure, particularly, Mr. President, as the objections the Senator now offers to the bill can be presented by a very simple amendment to section 8 of the Clayton bill when that comes up for consideration. For instance, to consider the last objection that is made first, I shall myself, being in entire accord with the Senator from Iowa in respect to that matter, offer to amend that by simply putting the word "competing" in line 15 between the words "another" and "corporation," so that section 8 will read:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another competing corporation.

That meets all the requirements of the case. I appreciate the justice of the criticism which is offered with respect to this matter. Even in the antitrust cases it is not necessary to establish that, by reason of the combination or conspiracy that is attacked, competition has actually been lessened or that monopoly has actually been established, if by reason of the combination or the contract the power is given to suppress competition, if those controlling it desire to exercise that power. So here the power being acquired by the acquisition of the stock, the acquisition of the stock of the competing company ought to be condemned by the law, in my humble judgment.

I simply desire to say that in voting against the amendment now offered by the Senator from Iowa I should not like to be understood as opposing the principle that he embodies, but simply as expressing the idea that it ought to be taken up in the consideration of the Clayton bill, when that is before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think it wise to permit a corporation to invest in the stocks of any competing corporation?

Mr. WALSH. The Clayton bill, I will advise the Senator, contains a large number of exceptions. For instance——

Mr. THOMAS. I know it does. I was asking the Senator his view of that policy.

Mr. WALSH. I am not prepared to vote for a rule which absolutely prohibits one corporation from owning the stock of another corporation under any and all circumstances.

Mr. THOMAS. I can conceive of a mining company investing in the stock of a concern devoted to the manufacture of cyanide of potassium, for example, or of a local transportation company. I can also conceive of a manufacturing concern investing its money in some manufacturing concern with which it could have no trade relation or connection whatever. I do not believe that it is the function of a corporation, which is presumably a public institution or a quasi-public institution, to become so identified with any other corporation or any other corporate enterprise. One of the great evils of the day, the monopolistic evil, has its germ, in my judgment, its origin, in the removal of the old and salutary restriction which prevented one corporation from investing in the stock of another under any circumstances. I think the way to handle this evil is to go to the root of it and to restore, if possible, those conditions which existed before it arose.

Mr. WALSH. There is not the slightest doubt in the world that the origin of all these troubles springs from the power given to one corporation to hold stock in another corporation.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit another interruption, just so long as we stop short of the condition which we abandoned, and the abandonment of which led to this evil, will our remedy, I am afraid, prove ineffectual.

Mr. WALSH. But I understand the Senator himself to say that he sees no evil in the holding of the stock of some corporations by other corporations.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; I did not so state. I instanced those as illustrations of investments which might still be made if the suggested amendment of the Senator limiting this restriction to competing corporations were enacted into law, but I did not approve of them. My reason for referring to it was that there could be such an investment, which should not be permitted, because it will inevitably ultimate in reproducing the abuses at which this bill is aimed in some other shape.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I rose simply to endeavor to avoid the discussion of those questions at this time, indicating my belief that they ought to be deferred until the Clayton bill is before us for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Transferring my general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], I transfer it to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will inquire if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with that Senator, but I will transfer the pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to transfer my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], but by agreement that pair is suspended as to all votes upon amendments to this bill and the bill itself. I will not make this announcement as to other votes upon the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] who is necessarily absent from the city. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). May I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator. I will transfer it to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the negative). I voted in the belief that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with whom I have a general pair had voted. I am informed that he has not voted. Accordingly I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—16

Brady	Crawford	Jones	Norris
Burton	Cummins	Kenyon	Perkins
Catron	Gallinger	Lane	Smoot
Clark, Wyo.	Gronna	Nelson	Sutherland

NAYS—38.

Fall	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.

So Mr CUMMINS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1784. An act restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and

H. R. 12579. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WALSH was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. CHILTON was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. POMERENE was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on the Census.

Mr. MYERS was, on his own motion, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES. That is, on the substitute, I understand, as amended thus far?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. There has been no substitute offered for section 5. The Senator from Iowa——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I was going to say that I expected to offer the amendment of which I gave notice a few minutes ago.

Mr. JONES. I understood there was to be an amendment offered, but the question was about to go to a vote, and the Senator from Iowa was absent. He ought to be here, and I was going to suggest the absence of a quorum simply to give him an opportunity to be present. I will not do that now if the Senator wants to offer an amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment which I sent to the desk a little while ago be now laid before the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the amendment been printed?

Mr. POMERENE. It was sent to the Printing Office, and I think it will be here in a very little while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment as a substitute for section 5, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 5 it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful. The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Whenever the commission, either upon information furnished by its agents or employees, or upon complaint duly verified by affidavit of any interested person, has reason to believe that any corporation is violating any of the provisions of this section, it shall issue and cause to be served a notice accompanied with a written statement of the violation charged upon such corporation, which shall thereupon be called upon within a reasonable time fixed in such notice, not to exceed 30 days thereafter, to appear and show cause why an order should not issue to restrain and prohibit the violation charged, and upon a hearing held pursuant to such notice the commission shall make and file its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and if it shall appear that such corporation is guilty of the violation charged, then the commission shall issue and cause to be served on such corporation an order commanding it forthwith to cease and desist from such violation within the time and in the manner prescribed in such order. Any such order may be modified or set aside at any time by the commission issuing it for good cause shown.

If any corporation charged with obedience thereto fails or neglects to obey any such order, the said commission, by its attorneys, if any it has, or by the appropriate district attorney, acting under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, may apply for an enforcement of such order to the district court of the United States for the district wherein such corporation has its domicile, or wherein any of the acts complained of were committed, or wherein it transacts any business, and therewith transmit to the said court the original record in the proceedings, including all the testimony taken therein and the report and the order of the commission duly attested by it. Upon the filing of the record, the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the questions determined therein and shall have power to make and to enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings such orders and decrees as may be just and equitable. On motion of the commission, and on such notice as the court shall deem reasonable, the court shall set down the cause for summary final hearing. Upon such final hearing the findings of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, but if either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is competent and material, and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may allow such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or before a master appointed by the court, and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem just. Disobedience to any order or decree which may be made in any such proceeding, or any injunction or other process issued therein, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 a day during the continuance of such disobedience or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any party to any proceedings brought under the provisions of this section, including the person upon whose complaint such proceedings shall have been begun, if begun on such complaint, as well as the United States, by and through the Attorney General thereof, may obtain a review of any final order made by such commission in any district court having jurisdiction to enforce any order which might have been made in the proceeding by such commission as hereinbefore provided, by serving notice upon the adverse party, if there be one, and filing the same with the said commission at any time within 30 days from the date of the entry of the order to be reviewed, and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had as are prescribed herein in the case of an application for the enforcement of an order made by the commission.

The pendency of such application for review shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the commission, but the district court in its discretion may stay or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the order of the commission pending the final hearing and determination by the court. No order or injunction so staying or suspending any such order shall be made by the district court except upon notice and after hearing, save that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the applicant, said court may, on hearing, after not less than three days' notice to the commission and the adverse party, if there be such, allow a temporary stay or suspension, in whole or in part, of the operation of the order of the commission for not more than 60 days from the date of the order of such court, in which case the said order shall contain a specific finding that such irreparable damage would result to the applicant. The court may, upon like application and showing, continue the temporary stay or suspension, in whole or in part, to such further period as it may deem proper.

Any final order or decree made by any district court, in any proceeding brought under this section, may be reviewed upon appeal, as in cases in equity, by the circuit court of appeals having jurisdiction to review the judgments and decrees of the district court making such order, provided that such appeal shall be taken within 60 days from the entry of such order or decree, and the judgment of the circuit court of appeals shall be final except that the same shall be subject to review upon certiorari or certificate, as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the judicial code.

The commission may provide for the publication of its reports under this section in such form and manner as may be best fitted for public information and use.

No order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask for the rereading of the latter part of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any final order or decree made by any district court, in any proceeding brought under this section, may be reviewed upon appeal, as in cases in equity, by the circuit court of appeals having jurisdiction to review the judgments and decrees of the district court making such order, provided that such appeal shall be taken within 60 days from the entry of such order or decree, and the judgment of the circuit court of appeals shall be final except that the same shall be subject to review upon certiorari or certificate, as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the judicial code.

The commission may provide for the publication of its reports under this section in such form and manner as may be best fitted for public information and use.

No order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he means by that last clause, that the findings shall not be admissible in evidence, to announce the same rule that is contained in the amendment which we have already adopted on that subject.

Mr. POMERENE. The amendment as adopted was added to the amendment after it was prepared by those having it in charge.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am very sorry that the Senator from Ohio has included that provision in his amendment. I should like to have voted for this amendment, but I can not vote for it with that provision in it, because I regard it as bad legislation, for the reasons that I have already expressed with reference to the amendment which we already adopted.

Mr. WEST. Are not the words included in another amendment that has already been adopted?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Exactly; the amendment has been adopted, and I hoped the Senator from Ohio might see his way clear to eliminate those words from this amendment, which are really not necessary. It is really a repetition of what the Senate has already adopted.

With that exception, Mr. President, I would vote for this amendment, not because I think it removes all the objectionable features that are to be now found in section 5 of the bill, but because I think it vastly improves it; and as between the two propositions, I prefer the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, although I do not mean to say by that that if perfected I would vote for it as a proposition by itself.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] express his approval of the principle of the amendment. The objectionable paragraph has already been adopted by the Senate, and at this moment stands with the approval of the Senate. Of course it was not necessary that we should attach to this amendment the part to which the Senator objects.

I desire to say briefly, in explanation of the amendment, that after the pending bill was reported to the Senate by the Interstate Commerce Committee several amendments to section 5 as therein contained were offered. Among these was one by the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], another by the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], and another by the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I myself offered an amendment to the bill embracing many of the features contained in the pending amendment. The Judiciary Committee had this subject matter before it for consideration, and it drafted a similar section, with special reference to the provisions contained in the Clayton bill on the subject of interlocking directorates and stockholding companies. I think the amendment as presented contains, perhaps, the best features of all of those amendments. I say "best" from the standpoint of those who favor legislation of this character.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I am familiar with the amendments to which the Senator from Ohio has referred, and I should like particularly if during his comments he will explain the difference between the amendment which he previously offered and the one which is now pending. It is difficult to follow the various phases of a long amendment being read from the Secretary's desk; at least it is so for a layman, and I should like to have some explanation of the difference.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say that in the main the principles contained in the first amendment I offered and in the amendment just now proposed and in the Clayton bill are in substance the same. The differences are rather in detail. The pending amendment provides that, either upon information gathered by the commission through its agents and representatives or upon the complaint of some one else, duly certified, setting forth the fact that a corporation has been guilty of unfair methods of competition, a notice shall be served upon such corporation, with a copy of the written complaint, requiring it to show cause within 30 days why an order should not be made compelling it to desist from further unfair methods of competition.

Provisions are made for the taking of testimony and for the summary hearing of the case. If the commission shall find that the complaint has been sustained, then it is the duty of the commission to issue an order against the accused corporation. If such corporation should fail to comply with the order, then the commission has the right to make application to the United States district court to enforce the order, filing with the application the record in the case below, including the testimony, the complaint, and the order which the commission made.

A hearing is provided for, and this order shall be prima facie in its effect. Additional testimony may be taken by any party concerned only when it is made to appear that the testimony was not known to the party offering to produce it at the time of the hearing below, or, if it was known, that it could not, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, be procured.

There is also a provision whereby the accused corporation, if it feels aggrieved, can file its application in a similar way in the district court for a review of the findings of the commission.

The party that files the complaint and the United States, by its Attorney General, also have the right to ask for a review. Provision is made in case of disobedience of the order of the commission for enforcing it by contempt proceedings.

After the analogy of the interstate-commerce law, it is likewise provided that the mere filing of the application in the district court shall not operate to suspend or annul the order which was theretofore made by the commission, but the court shall have the right, upon the motion of the aggrieved party and upon proper showing, to grant a suspension, in whole or in part, of the order of the commission for a period of 60 days, pending the final determination of the case. This order of suspension can, upon like showing, be continued for a further period, if the court in its wisdom deems proper.

There is also a provision to the effect that an appeal may be taken from the decree of the district court to the circuit court of appeals, and such decree shall be final, except that it may be reviewed, either on certiorari or upon a certificate, after the manner of obtaining reviews by the Supreme Court of the proceedings of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals as set forth in the circuit court of appeals act.

Mr. President, the differences to which I have referred as between the original amendment offered by myself and the pending amendment lie in these respects: First, my original amendment referred to the proceedings as the filing of a bill in equity. That language has been modified. The Clayton bill referred to the proceeding as an appeal from the commission to the United States court. The pending amendment refers to it simply as filing an application for review.

In the first amendment proposed by myself I did not attempt to state the effect that the order of the commission would have in the United States district court. I assumed, of course, that the burden of proof would be on the party having the affirmative of the issue. In the Clayton bill it was provided that the findings of fact before the commission should be prima facie proof in the court above, and that is the provision of the pending amendment.

In the Clayton bill there was no provision as to the effect which the so-called appeal to the district court would have upon the order of the commission. In the amendment which I have presented this afternoon, as well as in an amendment presented by me a few days ago, there is a provision that the appeal shall not stay the proceeding without the filing of a motion by the aggrieved party and a hearing thereon.

The Clayton bill and the pending amendment differ very radically from the provision of the bill as reported to the Senate by the committee, in that the committee bill did not have any provision for a review or an appeal by the accused corporation. In the committee bill there is no provision even for the filing of a complaint. The commission, if it had information to the effect that there was unfair competition, which seemed to justify its intervention, could simply serve a notice on the corporation to come before it within a period of 30 days and show cause why an order should not be issued against it to desist from the alleged unfair competition; but there was no provision in the committee bill requiring the commission to give any detailed information to the accused corporation which would advise it of the offense charged or give it an opportunity to meet its accuser in a reasonably fair way.

Under the committee bill, if the decision should be in favor of the accused corporation, there was no provision for any record whatever. The corporation would have been put to the expense of a trial without the benefit of any record in its behalf in the event that it was found to have complied with the law. On the other hand, if the finding of the commission should be against the corporation then the corporation was put in this unfortunate predicament: It was either compelled to comply with the order of the commission, though it might have felt it was aggrieved thereby, or it would be compelled to openly defy the order of the commission and await a proceeding by the commission in the United States district court in order to compel it to comply. I think most of the Senators who have investigated this subject felt that it would be doing a very great injustice to an accused corporation not to provide that it should have its day in court.

I think that, briefly stated, those are the principles contained in each of the bills and amendments which have been presented to the Senate on this subject; and I believe that, upon careful consideration, it will be found that the pending amendment contains the best parts of each of the several amendments to which I have referred.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to ask, before the Senator takes his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. REED. Has this amendment made any change in the definition of "unfair competition" as that phrase was contained in the section to which this is offered as an amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. It has not. The provision in that behalf is just the same as it was in the original provision.

Mr. REED. I listened to the Senator's remarks the other day, in which I understood him to take the position that the provision "unfair competition in commerce as hereby declared to be unlawful" would be restricted in its meaning to the meaning which has been given to that term by the courts. I understood him to hold at that time that there was a fatal defect in the bill because it did not give a definition for that phrase. I find it now copied in the same manner in the amendment which the Senator offers, and I am anxious to know whether the Senator has changed his mind with reference to the construction of that phrase.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not changed my mind as to the construction which I then placed upon the language of this bill. Without attempting to go into a rehearsal of my argument of the other day, I may state briefly that my position then was that the phrase "unfair competition" as contained in this bill would be restricted by the courts to such practices as were regarded as unfair competition under the common law; and, believing that it should have and would have that restricted meaning, I stated that I felt that it could be constitutionally defended.

I stated further that if it were to have the broader signification which is attached to those words by other Members of the Senate, then I should doubt its constitutionality, because, under the broader construction, in my judgment, it would be a delegation both of legislative and judicial power.

I do not think, however, in view of the fact that it can be defended with the restricted limitation which I believe the court will place upon the words "unfair competition" we ought to hesitate, because the court might give them the broader construction.

I recognize the fact that when it comes to the question of constitutional law and the courts are seeking to determine whether the statute is constitutional or not, if it is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would make it constitutional and the other make it unconstitutional, then the court would adopt the former construction.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH. I merely want to say a word in view of what has been stated by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield to the Senator from Montana in a moment. If the Senator will pardon me further, I desire to say that I understand a number of Senators on the committee have views differing from mine on this subject. I was simply voicing my own views the other day, as I am now, in that behalf.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it was in reference to that feature of the matter that I desired to say a word, because the authorship of the amendment was attributed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] partly to myself in some remarks he made sometime ago. Speaking for myself, I do not at all agree that the phrase "unfair competition" will receive or can receive so restricted a construction by the courts, and I do not believe that it will be construed as that phrase was understood at common law, if under the common law it was restricted in its meaning to include only the substitution of the goods of one man for the goods of another. I believe that when construed by the court it will be given the meaning which it has to-day in common parlance and the accepted significance that it has in the literature of this, our day.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to say, in answer to the Senator, that I had known what his view was on that subject well, and I do not believe under the common-law construction that the phrase would be given even the narrow and limited meaning which the Senator would attach to it by his expressed words.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understood the argument of the Senator from Ohio the other day upon this particular question to be in substantial agreement with the position I have taken, with the possible exception that perhaps the Senator from Ohio held the view that the term "unfair competition" had by some courts or court been extended slightly beyond the mere matter of the substitution of the goods of one man for the goods of another, but I thought he held to the view that it had an exceedingly narrow and limited meaning and that the courts in construing the term would look to the definitions which had been given to that term by the courts.

I therefore can not withhold an expression of surprise that he will bring in an amendment using identically the same language, because if the words have the exceedingly restricted meaning that I contend they have, or if they have the limited meaning the Senator from Ohio holds they have, if I understand him correctly, then we would accomplish but little by all this legislation, because we would not reach into that field which all concede ought to be carefully embraced in any law that is to be passed. I can not understand the position of the Senator from Ohio now. I say that, of course, in all kindness.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the Senator does not understand me. I think I understand my own position in this matter, and I recognize the fact that the construction I would place upon these words is a narrow construction compared with the field which it is hoped to cover by other members of the committee; but, on the other hand, if we will examine the authorities, whether they be text writers or adjudications upon the subject of what is unfair competition, we will find that that expression has a pretty broad scope, and it is because I believe that fact that I am willing to subscribe to this amendment as it is. I think that it is a step in the right direction, and I hope to see it passed by this Congress. I think that, with our future experience under it, we will get much more light, and I hope that in the near future the discussion of this subject will enable some one to define with exactness the words "unfair competition." I can not do so, and I have not seen anyone yet who has been able to define those words; at least to my satisfaction.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Ohio, I wish he would tell the Senate—he has served on the Committee on Interstate Commerce and is a very fine lawyer—what he thinks is embraced within this term; what practices outside of the substitution of the goods of one man for the goods of another, and, if he can, I hope he will tell me where I can find the rule settled in the books.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator might just as well ask me to define what cases were embraced in the word "fraud." No court has been able to define it. No legislative body has been able to define it. We have got to depend very largely upon the light we have gotten from the adjudications upon the subject; and the same rule must apply when it comes to what is to be embraced in the phrase "unfair competition."

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, if I were to ask the Senator to state what acts or classes of acts are embraced within the term "fraud," the Senator would have not the slightest hesitation in naming a great number. He could give numerous illustrations. For instance, he could say that if an attorney employed to represent a client were to deal with the client's property it would be fraudulent, unless he dealt with the client's full acquiesence and knowledge. He could say that if a man put his property out of his hands for the purpose of defeating his creditors, that was an act of fraud; and I need not multiply instances. Indeed, I could stand here, I suppose, until night and think of instances of fraud that have been condemned by the books.

One specific instance to which the term applies has been repeatedly cited. I read here the definition of "unfair competition" from three of the law dictionaries, and they all agreed that it covered simply the substitution of one man's goods for those of another. The Senator says he thinks it is broader than that, and yet he gives us no bound, no limit, no indication of how far it will go.

If that is his view I am a little surprised that he brings in a bill with that kind of language repeated in it. I understood he was opposed to section 5 because of the very vagueness and indefiniteness of that language. I may have misunderstood him.

The importance of section 5, in my judgment, does not rest in the details as to how it is to be enforced. The importance of section 5 rests in the question as to the scope of the authority and the jurisdiction we are about to confer. Indeed, the other matters are matters of detail; and I had hoped, when this committee of learned gentlemen, whether it is a voluntary committee or a regular committee, got together last night that they were going to bring us in either a specification of the acts and practices that are to be prohibited, or at least a general definition which would enable the business man and the lawyer and the citizen generally to know what authority the commission had and what his rights were. Instead of that we have the same old vague language, and three of the men who worked upon this bill last night have three different ideas about it now.

It seems to me that there is not such a dearth of talent that we can not at least write down what we intend to cover. I am disappointed. I hope this matter will lie over until to-morrow and be printed, and that the Senate will have a chance to examine it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri is able to define the phrase "unfair competition," there will never hereafter be any task which he can not perform. I do not think it is possible to define those words in the present state of the law so as to embrace everything which anyone might feel ought to be included within the prohibition of this bill; but the mere fact that some of my colleagues and myself agree that certain things are embraced within its terms, and we differ upon the question whether certain other things are embraced within its terms, is no reason why we should not try to legislate upon the subject and thereby put a stop to those things about which we do agree.

I understand, from the views that I entertain upon this subject, that there are many, many branches of deception and fraud which are covered by the term "unfair competition." We can say generally that it refers to that class of acts whereby one dealer seeks to make the public believe that his goods are the goods of another. There are hundreds of different kinds of practices which may be embraced within that classification. It goes to questions of espionage upon the business of another. It touches upon the question of trade-marks. That is only a very small part of the kind of acts which are now known as "unfair competition."

I regret that I am not able to define the words more explicitly, and I should be glad to have some one else do it; and I know of no one who could venture upon that field with greater prospects of success than my very learned friend from Missouri.

Mr. REED Mr. President, every time there is an objection raised to the language the answer is, "Well, it is true we do not know what it means; we do not know what we mean ourselves; but we are going to do it, and if you do not like it you write a law that is all right." That is the spirit.

Mr. President, as long as I live I do not intend to vote to vest in a board of men the power to do something of great moment and great sweep and great gravity when I do not myself, at least, entertain a clear idea as to the powers I have granted.

Is it possible that Senators charged with writing a law are willing to write a law about which they confess in advance they have not the slightest conception as to its scope or meaning, and that they will do that simply because they find difficulty in expressing a rule? Is it possible that we are willing to confer upon any board of men, whether they be lawyers or commissioners or judges of courts, a power which we can neither understand nor bound nor describe? Are we willing to confer that kind of power on human beings? Is there any man here who has ever practiced before a court, who has ever seen the inside of law books, who is willing to subscribe his name to a bill when he says in advance that he has no idea as to what is covered by that bill?

It seems to me that is an utterly indefensible position. I can understand the Senator from Nevada, and I can understand his position. It is logical, whether it be sound or not; it is coherent, and each part of it can be reconciled with each other part of it, if you can divide up an opinion. You certainly can divide a theory. The Senator from Nevada holds to the doctrine, broadly, that we have the right to confer upon these three men the absolute power, in their discretion and guided by their judgment, to say to all of the business men of the United States what they can do and what they can not do. He has a definite idea. He is willing to confer that vast and limitless power upon five men. But my friend from Ohio astounds me when he says that he does not believe we are vesting these powers within the discretion of a commission, but that he thinks we are conferring some power, and he has no idea how far that power goes, or what it embraces, or to what extent it may be exercised.

I heard the Senator's speech, and I heard him say:

> One of the most unsatisfactory features of this bill is that which declares unfair competition to be unlawful, without any attempt to define what unfair competition is; and I have seen no bill thus far which eliminates that objection. I was led to believe, and I believe now, that if it were to become the law of the land the courts would hold that the words "unfair competition" mean only such practices as are held to be unfair competition under the common law. I can not believe that the term "unfair competition" could be used in its colloquial or popular sense, if it has a colloquial or popular sense, which I do not believe.

And so on throughout this very interesting address the other day the Senator from Ohio held to the limited construction. If it is limited to the definitions laid down in the common law, if that is what this term means, then, of course, we know what we are legislating about; but that meaning is so limited that it will work no benefit to write it in this bill.

The Senator intimates, without exactly saying, that he thinks the language will go further than that, but he does not know how far it will go. He does not know where it will lead us. It seems to me that it is a case of the blind leading the blind. It seems to me that we are wholly unjustified in taking a position of that kind.

Mr. President, I have talked upon this bill until I have no right to take the time of the Senate further. The Senate is not considering this bill, Mr. President. The Senate is largely absent. The Senate has been largely absent, or the Senators; and when the discussion is on Senators largely remain away from the Chamber.

I attended a meeting the other night when there were a great many gentlemen present who said they were going to be in this Chamber and attend to their duties.

Mr. THOMAS. All of them.

Mr. REED. And yet this discussion has gone on, and there have been many very able addresses made to empty benches. We are about to vote upon a proposition that affects the welfare of every man, woman, and child in the United States, affects all our business policies, reaches out into a new field that is radically different from those we have occupied, and I regret to say the Senators are not analyzing and considering this legislation.

I appeal to my friends on this side of the Chamber whether we can afford to make a great mistake. I appeal to every man who understands—and we all do understand—the fundamentals of our Government whether we are prepared to grant an unlimited and unbounded power to a board of men; whether we are willing to enact a law when the four or five or six authors of that law all entertain different views as to what it means, and those opinions, not as to mere shadow ground, not as to doubtful questions, are as far apart as the North Pole and the Southern Cross.

Of course there is a shadow ground about every law. We reach a point where complicated facts may fall upon the right side of the line or upon the left. You can not draw a law as to which that condition will not arise, but you can draw laws that are plain as to their rules, and then the only question of doubt arises from applying that plain rule to a complicated condition of facts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, a few moments ago I directed an inquiry to the Senator from Ohio, asking him to explain the provision which is now under consideration and how it differed from an amendment which he had heretofore offered. While he was making the explanation—and I think it was clear and concise—I tried to place myself in the position of a client and to place him in the position of my attorney telling me what I could do under this law. The longer I heard his explanation the more convinced I became that its title should be—

> A bill to boom the legal profession and to increase the emoluments of the members thereof.

The Senator from Ohio has assured us that he does not know just exactly what this is going to mean or what the results will be. I am inclined to vote for the amendment which he has offered. I want to read it over once or twice before doing so, to try to come to a conclusion as to what it means, but I am inclined to vote for it, for it seems to me that it is an improvement on section 5 of the bill. In fact, I think anything would be an improvement on that section. I am willing to take the assurance of the Senator from Ohio, who is a good lawyer, that possibly it will remove the constitutional objection which rests against the bill.

Now, we talk about the "new freedom" or some kind of freedom which is going to surround the business men of this country who are surrounded by a maze now. That condition will be increased by this legislation. Somebody has prepared a letter which, I think, was first published in the New York Sun—I found it in the Boston Traveler of yesterday—which illustrates about the condition that the business man will be in when this legislation is adopted. I will read it to the Senate. It is from one corporation to another—directed to the Smith Manufacturing Co.—of course a hypothetical company—of Rochester, N. Y.:

SMITH MANUFACTURING CO., Rochester, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to your letter (see Postal Regulation, p. 126, pp. 44) of the 28th, we (a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio certificate filed in the office of the secretary of New York State, N. Y.) beg to advise you that we can quote the price of $20 (see U. S. R. S., laws of 1914, sec. 18) per ton, carload lots (see Interstate Commerce ruling 256; see also dicta in 128 U. S., 264; Brown v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co., 168 Pa., 267). This quotation is special to you (see ruling of Department of Justice in the matter of Brown Milling Co.), and is made subject to our right to claim immunity (see N. Y. Penal Code, p. 48). If you receive a better quotation from any other of our competitors, you will, of course, advise us under the authority of United States Revised Statutes, page 2247, subdivision 2. We shall be glad to fill your order (subject to rule laid down in leading case of Jackson v. Cobb, 126 U. S., 232), and will ship according to your instruction (see Rule 37, N. Y. Publicity Commission).

Very truly, yours,

J. P. JONES,
President Jones Manufacturing Co.

[Laughter.]

STATE OF OHIO, County of Fairfield, ss:

J. P. Jones, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he has submitted the foregoing letter to his counsel, and has been advised that it is legal; that deponent is not a director of any bank, trust company, or transportation company; that the Jones Manufacturing Co. has never had its charter forfeited, nor has deponent ever been indicted by either State or Federal grand jury.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I judge from the article which the Senator from Massachusetts has read that the supposititious gentleman who wrote the letter must have thought this proposed statute, with reference to "unfair competition," was pretty nearly as elastic as the Senator from Nevada regards it. I think he must have had in mind the rules of construction laid down in a note on the construction of exemption statutes to a case found in Forty-fifth American Decisions, and which rules I think the Senator from Nevada must also have had in mind, because he has given a meaning quite as liberal and elastic to this term "unfair competition," according to the statements which he has from time to time made.

I think I will trespass on the patience of the Senate long enough to read it:

The rule that statutes in derogation of the common law shall be strictly construed, has no application to homestead exemption laws. The right to sell the real property of the debtor for payment of his debts was not a common-law right, but is purely statutory, and hence the rule can have no application, and such statutes will be liberally construed.

This reason for the nonapplication of the rule does not apply to statutes exempting personal property. It was at common law subject to execution and undoubtedly its exemption is in derogation of it.

Then the note goes on further and says:

They are humane in their nature and are generally liberally construed.

Thus, under the broad and liberal construction of these laws, terms supposed to be very definite in their meaning, have become exceedingly elastic.

As I think this term is definite in the strict meaning of the law.

In the sheltering ægis of statutory construction it has been found that a statute exempting a "team" will also exempt a two-horse wagon, probably because the team draws the wagon after it, or, in the language of the laws of conveyances, the wagon is attached to and runs with the team. (Dains v. Prosser, 32 Barb., 290.) Under the magical shadow of a statute construed in the case of humanity, a heifer not 2 years old and wholly unknown to her masculine affinity, the bull, has been transformed into a cow. (Freeman v. Carpenter, 10 Vt., 433; S. C., 33 Am. Dec., 210. Carruth v. Grassie, 11 Gray, 211.)

[Laughter.]

Two calves 9 months old, having but lately undergone the process of weaning, have suddenly been promoted to the dignity, have been clothed with the toga virilis, as it were, of "a yoke of oxen or steers."

[Laughter.]

The bucolic judge learnedly remarks: "They are calf-steers or steer-calves. * * * These steers were not heifers, they were not bulls, and therefore must be steers" (Peck, J., Mundell v. Hammond, 40 Vt., 641); and they were held exempt.

[Laughter.]

Under the term "a yoke of oxen," a wild and untamed steer, 20 months old, whose neck ne'er knew the yoke nor back the lash, has taken shelter and been protected from execution. (Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan., 293.) And as if the statute were an Aladdin's lamp to effect a transformation, or judges jugglers to mix up words and meanings, a cart was held to include a four-wheeled wagon. (Favers v. Glass, 22 Ala., 624.) A yoke of oxen included a single ox. (Wolfenbarger v. Standifer, 3 Sneed, 659.) A mule is a horse in Texas. (Allison v. Brookshire, 38 Tex., 199.) But Tennessee goes Texas one better. There a jackass is cosmopolitan in his nature, and may be either "horse, mule, or a yoke of oxen."

[Laughter.]

An explanation might be found for a jackass being a horse in the mathematical axiom that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other, and each is a half brother to the mule; and so one might be found for a jackass being a mule under the statute which considers half blood the same as whole blood; but why a jackass is an ox or a yoke of oxen must forever remain shrouded in deep and inscrutable mystery. (Richardson v. Duncan, 2 Heisk., 220.)

[Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is intended to define more precisely than the committee bill does the jurisdiction of the court over the orders of the proposed Federal trade commission. The bill as reported by the committee is indefinite in that respect.

The three views that are offered for the consideration of the Senate are these. The first bestows upon the commission the greatest possible power to determine what is a method of unfair competition and leaves to the court as little appellate jurisdiction or revisory power as possible. That method might be compared to the average case at law which is sent to the appellate court by writ of error to determine whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict or the finding of the court below. That is the extreme view in that direction.

The extreme in the other direction is the one which proposes to give to the finding of the commission nothing more than a complaint, where the record is to be transferred to the appellate court, and that court is to try the case de novo on such evidence as may be offered at that time by one side or the other.

The third method, and the one which has been adopted by the Judiciary Committee and is found in the Clayton bill as reported to the Senate, gives to the findings of the commission a prima facie weight, and the court is then to take the record from the commission and accept the findings at their prima facie value, but may admit other evidence, newly discovered, if it seems to the court to be just.

The Judiciary Committee has struggled with this problem and has reported a very fair and definite method of review of the findings by the Federal trade commission. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, as I understand it, differs from the mode adopted by the Judiciary Committee in only two or three minor particulars. One is the review from the decision of the court. The Judiciary Committee allows an appeal, I believe, directly from the United States district court to the Supreme Court of the United States. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio provides that the review of the district court's decision shall be by the circuit court of appeals, with the usual resort to certiorari, or by certificate from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio follows the order of the Judiciary Committee's amendment. It adopts the phraseology and is very nearly the same.

I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio with pleasure, and I hope that it will be adopted, because in one or two particulars it seems to me to be an improvement upon the Judiciary Committee's method.

But I wish to give notice to the Senate that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio be not adopted, I shall offer an amendment which is modeled exactly upon the proposed method of review that has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, so far as it applies to the case in hand, and ask that that be adopted. That amendment I offered this morning, and it has now been printed and is available.

I ought to say that I did omit from the Judiciary Committee's amendment one paragraph, but I have no objection to having that reinserted, which provides a penalty for disobedience. In the Clayton bill the disobedience which was intended to be punished was of a much more inclusive character than the disobedience under the trade-commission bill, and the penalty of $100 a day, while it is all right in the Clayton bill, where it will remain, would be rather drastic in the trade-commission bill. I think that is the only particular in which I have varied.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I desire to have put in the RECORD, where it may be available for the Senate, the entire decree by Judge Kenesaw M. Landis in the case of the United States of America, petitioner, against The Central West Publishing Co. and others. This decree has been already referred to in the Senate, but it may be well for me to call attention directly to five different kinds of methods of unfair competition that were thought by Judge Landis to come under the term "unfair competition." I will read from the second paragraph of that decree:

2. That the defendants herein and each of them have both separately and in concert committed acts in unfair competition against mutual competitors, and that these defendants and each of them as to said matters be permanently and specifically enjoined and restrained from either directly or indirectly, separately or in concert, through their agents or employees, from in any manner committing or doing any acts of unfair competition against the competitors of either of these defendants, and that specifically each be permanently enjoined from thus doing or aiding in doing any of the following acts.

I ask the Senate to note that that is exactly the form that is followed by any court in equity when it enjoins a trespass. It first enjoins the committing of trespass upon the property of the complainant in general terms, and then goes ahead and specifically indicates the particular forms of trespass that the defendant is commanded not to do; for instance, breaking down a fence, treading down the grass, cutting a tree, picking berries, or what not.

Judge Landis after laying down the general injunction that the defendants must refrain from committing any acts of unfair competition and leaving it to the defendants at their peril to know what are those unfair acts of competition, as a rule of guidance to make it more specific and to give them less chance to come into court and make excuses if they are cited for contempt, lays down these particular acts:

(1) From underselling any competing service with the intent or purpose of injuring or destroying a competitor of either of these defendants.

(2) From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of such competitors of either of these defendants, so as to secure the trade of such customers, without regard to the price.

(3) From in any manner or for any length of time selling his or its service in either plate, ready print, or matrices, either separately or one service with another, at less than a fair and reasonable price, with the purpose or intent of injuring or destroying the business of any competitor of either of these defendants.

(4) From threatening any customer of a competitor with starting a competing plant unless he patronizes one or the other of these defendants.

(5) From threatening the competitors of either of these defendants that they must either cease competing with defendants or sell out to one or the other of the defendants herein, and from threatening that unless they do their industries will be destroyed by the establishment of near-by plants to actively compete with them or by any other method of unfair competition.

That is, Judge Landis, one judge on the Federal bench, and a judge of great ability and great experience, first enjoins the defendants from committing any acts of unfair competition. He then defines five specific classes of unfair competition and winds up by saying, "or by any other method of unfair competition."

Quoting, now, from the fifth paragraph:

5. That each of the defendants named in this petition be specifically and permanently enjoined and restrained from combining or joining in any acts—

(a) Of unfair competition either against another or against any mutual competitor;

(b) Looking toward a combination between any of these defendants;

(c) Any acts done with the intent or purpose of driving out of the industries in which they are now engaged of either of these defendants, or of any of their competitors.

The Senate should note that Judge Landis in this formal and solemn decree put each of the defendants at his peril to know what was unfair competition.

This decree merely indicates a part of the things that a man who is fit to sit upon the bench may decide to come within the general term "unfair competition."

Before I sit down I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the World-Herald of Omaha, Nebr. This editorial was offered by me about a week ago and was objected to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], probably because he thought it might be offensive in some way to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I have shown it to the Senator from Nebraska, and I offer it now without reading, with his approval and knowledge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection the decree of Judge Landis and the editorial will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

United States of America, petitioner, v. Central-West Publishing Co., Western Newspaper Union, American Press Association, et al., defendants. No. 30888. Decree.

This cause, coming on for hearing on this 3d day of August, A. D. 1912, before the Hon. K. M. Landis, district judge of this court, and the petitioner having appeared by its district attorney, James H. Wilkerson, and by William T. Chantland, special assistant to the Attorney General, and having moved the court for an injunction in accordance with the prayer of its petition, and it appearing to the court that the allegations of the petition state a cause of action against the defendants under the provisions of the act of July 2, 1890, known as the antitrust act, and that the court has jurisdiction of the persons and the subject matter, and that the defendants have each been regularly served with proper process and have filed their answers to the petition, and that the defendants, Central-West Publishing Co., Western Newspaper Union, Western Newspaper Union of New York, George A. Joslyn, John F. Cramer, H. H. Fish, and M. H. McMillen, by their attorneys, J. H. Cowin, John J. Sullivan, and Charles F Harding, and the defendants, American Press Association, Courtland Smith, W. G. Brogan, and Maurice F. Germond, by their attorney, Charles A. Brodek, have given and do now give in open court their consent to the rendition and entering of the following decree:

Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed:

I. That the defendants, and each of them, are found and they are hereby declared to have been and to be now engaged in an attempt to monopolize interstate trade and commerce in the business of shipping ready-print papers, matrices, and stereotyped plates, and in the dissemination of news among the several States of the Union, all done and carried on in violation of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the antitrust act.

II. That the defendants herein and each of them have both separately and in concert committed acts in unfair competition against mutual competitors, and that these defendants and each of them as to said matters be permanently and specifically enjoined and restrained from either directly or indirectly, separately or in concert, through their agents or employees, from in any manner committing or doing any acts of unfair competition against the competitors of either of these defendants, and that specifically each be permanently enjoined from thus doing or aiding in doing any of the following acts:

(1) From underselling any competing service with the intent or purpose of injuring or destroying a competitor of either of these defendants.

(2) From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of such competitors of either of these defendants, so as to secure the trade of such customers, without regard to the price.

(3) From in any manner or for any length of time selling his or its service in either plate, ready print, or matrices, either separately or one service with another, at less than a fair and reasonable price, with the purpose or intent of injuring or destroying the business of any competitor of either of these defendants.

(4) From threatening any customer of a competitor with starting a competing plant unless he patronizes one or the other of these defendants.

(5) From threatening the competitors of either of these defendants that they must either cease competing with defendants or sell out to one or the other of the defendants herein, and from threatening that unless they do their industries will be destroyed by the establishment of near-by plants to actively compete with them or by any other method of unfair competition.

III. That the defendants, Western Newspaper Union, Western Newspaper Union of New York, Central-West Publishing Co., George A. Joslyn, John F. Cramer, H. H. Fish, and M. H. McMillen, be, and they are hereby, permanently enjoined from either directly or indirectly, by themselves or through their agents or employees, from in any manner continuing to do any acts in unfair competition against the other defendant company in this petition named, to wit, American Press Association, as alleged in divisions 6 and 7 of this petition, and particularly that they be thus enjoined from doing any of the following acts:

(a) From combining or attempting to combine with said defendant American Press Association, either by purchase, stock ownership, or in any other manner.

(b) From holding out inducements, in the way of control or otherwise, to the said American Press Associations, or either of them, or any of their officers, agents, or employees, to induce or compel a combination between the Western Newspaper Union and its allied concerns and the American Press Associations.

(c) From selling any of their product or services at less than a fair and reasonable profit, or at cost, or less than cost, with the purpose or intent of injuring or destroying the interstate trade and commerce of the American Press Association, or of any other competitors.

(d) From in any manner, either directly or indirectly, causing any person or persons or company to purchase stock or become interested in the American Press Association for the purpose of or with the effect of harassing the said American Press Association by unconscionable or unreasonable demands for an examination of its books or inquiry into its business methods, or the institution of suits, with such or like purpose in view.

(e) From in any manner, either directly or indirectly, instructing, causing, or permitting their agents or employees or traveling salesmen throughout the country, to circulate reports or to intimate or convey the impression that these defendants will put the American Press Association out of business, or that the American Press Association will not be able to continue in business against the competition of the defendants, or that the American Press Association intends to or is about to combine with the defendants or the defendants with them, or to intimate or convey the impression that unless publishers approached by such salesmen deal with these defendants, they will be discriminated against as soon as the American Press Association shall be put out of business by the competition to which it is being subjected.

(f) From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of the other defendants hereto, so as to secure the trade of such customers, without regard to the price.

(g) From in any manner threatening or intimating that they will start competing papers at points where customers of the American Press Association or other competitors refuse to deal with them, either in plate or ready-print matter, or both.

(h) From in any manner promising or intimating to any publisher or other person who is a customer of the American Press Association, or any other competitor, that they will protect such customer against expenses and costs in any suit that may arise by reason of the repudiation of any contract between such competitor and such customer.

(i) From in any manner retaining or permitting the retention by their agents or employees of plate metal or other property belonging to the American Press Association or other competitor of said defendants.

(j) From in any manner offering bonuses of paper or plate service free or at a nominal price with the purpose and intent of inducing or enabling customers of the American Press Association or any other competitor to temporarily change to home-print papers and thus to assist them in breaking contracts with the said American Press Association with lessened chance of liability for breach of contract; and, furthermore, from offering in connection with such bonus to sell their service at less than the usual price to such customer of such competitor, and from offering as a part of such plan the continued use of free plate for the home-print side of the papers of such customer.

(k) From purchasing or acquiring stock in any other corporation, or interest in any other concern, engaged in the manufacture or sale of plate matter or ready prints, and not a party hereto; and from acquiring the property and business of any such company, unless application be made to and permission to make such purchase be granted by this court.

(l) From in any manner unfairly criticizing and abusing the method of the said American Press Association with reference to advertising, or from doing any of said things through its weekly house organs, known as the Publishers' Auxiliary and the Western Publisher, and particularly from misrepresenting through said means the business and business methods of the American Press Association, with the intent and for the purpose of taking away the customers of the said American Press Association, or otherwise injuring its business.

(m) From in any manner continuing or participating in unfair attacks upon the said American Press Association, with the purpose of injuring or depreciating or destroying the value of the property and securities of the said American Press Association.

(n) From maintaining any auxiliary plant in any cities of the United States apparently independent, but in fact the property of the Western Newspaper Union, or its officers and stockholders, for the purpose and with the intent of making the newspaper trade generally believe such institutions to be independent.

IV. That the defendants American Press Association, Courtland Smith, W. G. Brogan, and Maurice F. Germond be perpetually enjoined from in any manner, either personally or as officers, or through their agents or employees, from continuing to commit or assisting in the commission of any acts of unfair competition directed against the defendants Central-West Publishing Co., Western Newspaper Union, or any other of these named defendants' competitors, and that they be permanently enjoined particularly from in any manner doing or committing any of the following acts:

(a) From selling its adless ready-print or plate service for less than a fair and reasonable price, or at cost, or below cost, with the purpose or intent of injuring the business of these named defendants or other competitors of the said American Press Association.

(b) From in any manner unfairly criticizing and abusing the method of the said Western Newspaper Union with reference to advertising through these defendants' circulars relating to its bureau of foreign advertising, or from doing any of said things through its weekly house organ, known as the American Press, and particularly from misrepresenting through said means the business and business methods of the Western Newspaper Union, with the intent and for the purpose of taking away the customers of the said Western Newspaper Union or otherwise injuring its business.

(c) From in any manner continuing or participating in unfair attacks upon the said Western Newspaper Union with the purpose of injuring or depreciating or destroying the value of the property and securities of the said Western Newspaper Union.

(d) From maintaining any auxiliary plant in any cities of the United States apparently independent but in fact the property of the American Press Association, or its officers and stockholders, for the purpose and with the intent of making the newspaper trade generally believe such institutions to be independent.

(e) From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of the other defendants hereto, so as to secure the trade of such customers, without regard to the price.

(f) From in any manner retaining or permitting the retention by their agents or employees of plate metal or other property belonging to the Western Newspaper Union or other competitor of said defendants.

(g) From in any manner offering bonuses of paper or plate service, free or at a nominal price, with the purpose and intent of inducing or enabling customers of the Western Newspaper Union or any other competitor to temporarily change to home print papers and thus to assist them in breaking contracts with the said Western Newspaper Union with lessened chances of liability for breach of contract, and, furthermore, from offering in connection with such bonus to sell their service at less than the usual price to such customer of such competitor, and from offering as a part of such plan the continued use of free plate for the home print side of the papers of such customer.

(h) From purchasing or acquiring stock in any other corporation or interest in any other concern engaged in the manufacture or sale of plate matter or ready prints and not a party hereto, and from acquiring the property and business of any such company, unless application be made to and permission to make such purchase be granted by this court.

V. That each of the defendants named in this petition be specifically and permanently enjoined and restrained from combining or joining in any acts—

(a) Of unfair competition either against another or against any mutual competitor;

(b) Looking toward a combination between any of these defendants;

(c) Any acts done with the intent or purpose of driving out of the industries in which they are now engaged of either of these defendants or of any of their competitors;

And as to each of the above acts defendants, and each of them and their officers and agents, are enjoined from doing them, either separately or in concert or conjunction with either of the other defendants.

It is further ordered that the defendants, Western Newspaper Union and the American Press Association, each pay one-half the cost of this suit to be taxed.

When in this decree the American Press Association is mentioned, reference is had to both the American Press Association organized under the laws of New York and the American Press Association organized under the laws of West Virginia, or if such portion of the decree is not appropriate to both, the one is intended to which it is appropriate.

KENESAW M. LANDIS, Judge.

[From the Omaha (Nebr.) World-Herald, Tuesday, July 7, 1914.]

FOR FAIR TRADE.

The World-Herald is very glad to acknowledge receipt of a letter from the American Fair Trade League, an organization of successful and widely known business men evidently in sympathy with the general purpose of the antitrust legislation now under consideration at Washington.

The letter, signed in behalf of the league by its secretary, Edmond A. Whittier, and mailed from headquarters in New York, is, in part, as follows:

"Admittedly the most far-reaching development in the formulation of antitrust legislation is the President's approval of the incorporation in the Federal trade commission bill of provisions declaring 'unfair competition' to be 'unlawful,' and prescribing that 'the commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.' The commission, under these new sections of the bill, is further empowered to call upon the Federal courts to enforce its order in the event of disobedience.

"Senator Newlands, chairman of the interstate commerce committee, has reported the bill to the Senate thus amended. This legislation, now assured by this agreement between the executive and the legislative leaders of the majority party will be an admission by Congress of the evils which are the cause of the country-wide support of the Stevens bill 'to prevent discrimination in prices and to provide for publicity of prices to dealers and to the public.' * * * This new turn of affairs at Washington has resulted from constant pressure by consumers and small business men for laws which will really penetrate to the roots of dishonest business practices."

The letter quotes approvingly an editorial from a St. Paul newspaper—the News—which declares that "the nub of the legislation" now before Congress is this: "Declaring unfair competition in commerce unlawful and creating a commission to drag it into the open." "That's all there is," declares the editorial incorporated into this letter of the Fair Trade League, "to this awful threatened interference with prosperity."

The letter to the World-Herald from this organization of business men concludes in this wise: "A word from you will help every honest merchant and every consumer in the country. Will you say it?"

We will cheerfully. And we have repeatedly. And we will, furthermore, call to the attention of our readers the standing of some of these American business men who, rather than throw stones at a Democratic President and Congress for "interfering with business," are standing back of their efforts to set honest business free.

The president of the league is Charles H. Ingersoll, manufacturer of the famous "dollar watch." The vice president is Dr. Lee Galloway, professor of commerce and industry in New York University. On the executive committee list appear such names as these:

J. P. Archibald, ex-president National Retail Jewelers' Association.
Bartlett Arkell, president Beech-Nut Packing Co.
J. E. Baum, president Supplee Hardware Co., of Philadelphia.
Frank B. Connolly, vice president National Retail Grocers' Association.
Abraham Erlanger, president the "B. V. D." Co.
Henry B. Joy, president Packard Motor Car Co.
W. K. Kellogg, president Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co.
Alfred Lucking, counsel Ford Motor Car Co., and a number of others of similar high standing.

And on the advisory committee appear the names of officers of such well-known corporation as the Glastenbury Knitting Co., the Contoocook Mills Corporation, the Kryptok Co., the Interwoven Stocking Co., the Globe-Wernicke Co., and a great many others.

These business men want fair trade, regulated and honest competition—precisely what President Wilson and a Democratic Congress are striving to promote. They want to make it possible for men to do business in this country without fear of being crushed by trusts and monopolies, which is what the Democratic Party has been demanding for these many years. They are not asking that legislation to this end be delayed or defeated; they are asking that it be passed. They realize that such legislation will "interfere" not with honest and legitimate business, but with business that is neither and that is now interfering with business that is both. They are urging the country to support the President and Congress in passing laws that will stop the interference with business that is making prosperity lopsided, that has made trustified and monopolized business all-powerful, and that has all but closed the gates to independent and genuinely competitive enterprise.

The condition that has been, as well as the condition the Democratic Party is striving to establish, are well described in an editorial in the Indianapolis News, which says:

"A great, and in some respects a wonderful, system had been built up largely on privilege—tariff and other. Through enormous contributions to campaign funds the great trusts and railroads purchased favors from the Government. A few men, with a direct and selfish interest in the matter, decided what our taxes should be. It was a veritable feudal system, based not on birth but on wealth and usurped power. It is against this system that the national administration, backed by the people, has arrayed itself. We are seeking some measure of democracy in trade and commerce, as we have it in politics. We have to-day—and may we continue to have—a Government that is at least stronger than the Steel Trust. And with it we shall have a more widely diffused prosperity and a greater command of the good things of life than we have ever had. The people have resolved that this country shall be what it was meant to be, the country of the average man. Whatever suffering there is is due to the fact that the evils were allowed to grow to such enormous proportions as to make their eradication extraordinarily difficult. The blame must rest not on those who are now trying to right the wrongs, but on those who sat still and allowed them to reach their present proportions."

The World-Herald is rejoiced to have the evidence that many of the foremost business men of the country, business men who do business by adding to the national wealth rather than by gambling in and juggling with the wealth others have produced, understand and are in sympathy with the purposes of the Democratic Party.

Mr. WEEKS. Before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I wanted to make one inquiry. I understood from his reading that one of the acts which Judge Landis described as unfair competition was a traveling man approaching the customers of another corporation and offering to sell to those customers at a lower price than they were purchasing.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; selling to them at all hazards, without regard to the price. Now, that is a well-known method of unfair competition.

Mr. WEEKS. What do you mean by all hazards?

Mr. HOLLIS. To make the sale without regard to the price; to make the sale anyway, so as to drive the other fellow out, and after you have driven him out and gotten rid of the competition, then have the field to yourself, and put your price up and charge extortionate rates. That is what is enjoined and very clearly put. I will read it again if the Senator would like to hear it.

Mr. WEEKS. That particular case I was interested in.

Mr. HOLLIS. I would be very glad to read it again:

From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of such competitors of either of these defendants, so as to secure the trade of such customers without regard to the price.

Those are the words that were overlooked by the Senator. I have no doubt he would agree that that was not fair practice. If not, he will disagree with Judge Landis.

Mr. WEEKS. I wanted to ask how a corporation would get new business in the ordinary course of affairs unless it did in some way shave the price at which it sold its goods.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator there qualifies and has just shown where the line is. "Without in some way." Some ways are perfectly fair, just as some restraints of trade are perfectly fair, but you must apply the rule of reason, which every judge has in his head, for the very purpose. It is perfectly easy in any definite case laid down before the judge, in connection with the other practices, to decide whether it is a reasonable and fair method of competition.

This statute leaves it to the judge to apply the rule of reason, precisely as our courts have under the Sherman antitrust act, and there can not be any difficulty in the application. There is no more difficulty than there is with all laws that are meant to reach evil practices. There is difficulty in the application of all of them. The humorous description read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] shows how people in Texas, who ought to know, can not always tell how to class a jackass and a mule. We do not have great trouble here in Washington telling one from the other.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire how much shave in price he should think would be fair, and where the line would be drawn.

Mr. HOLLIS. I could not tell until the Senator should tell me the class of goods and tell me in what district the sale was made and for what purpose the sale was made and many other things. I should not know enough about that until the evidence was put before me, but I will be frank to say that if the evidence was put before the Senator he could tell very quickly.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] whether he is not willing to strike out lines 21, 22, and 23 on page 5 of his amendment? It is the paragraph providing for the publication of the reports of the commission.

Mr. President, I should like to see, if we are to refer to that subject at all, a paragraph prohibiting the publication of the reports of this commission. The people of the United States are buried under an avalanche of reported cases, ground out with constant and monotonous regularity by 50 or 60 tribunals, to which are added those of the Interstate Commerce Commission and those of some nisi prius tribunals. The result of this grist of decided cases upon American law is to reduce it to a state of chaos and confusion.

There is not a lawyer in the sound of my voice who is not able to advise his clients what the law is. But not a single one of them is able to advise his clients what the courts will determine the law to be. In appellate cases attorneys were accustomed at one time to prepare what was called a brief, which was submitted to the court for its guidance and instruction. The attorney's brief of to-day consists always of one and occasionally of two volumes, made necessary because of the multitudinous reported decisions upon every conceivable question which can vex the brain of the average attorney.

Now, every added decision serves to increase the confusion, and the time has come when authorities can be gathered, and able ones, too, in unqualified support of both sides of every conceivable human proposition. Practicing law nowadays entails a degree of labor and investigation upon the part of the practitioner and the courts that is appalling. If we are going to have a fresh batch of them coming from another source, let us rather suppress them and see to it that they are not published in official form.

One of the greatest men of this generation, Mr. President, is the former President of the Mexican Republic, Porfirio Diaz, and to my mind one of the chief evidences of his wisdom and statesmanship was his interdict upon the publication of all the decisions of his courts. The judges were required to pass upon and determine the controversy according to the written law and their understanding of it, without regard to precedents found in former opinions. While Mexico is not in any particular a model government, and never has been, yet I venture to say that in the administration of justice the courts were able to proceed quite as intelligently without, as our courts are able to proceed, with so many reported cases.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Are we to understand that the Senator from Colorado is seriously urging that the publication of the reports of the supreme court of his State should cease?

Mr. THOMAS. Indeed, Mr. President, I am. I wish we could pass an amendment to our constitution making it a capital offense to issue another volume of reports. I never was more serious in my life. I want to say, and to repeat, and reiterate if necessary, that the increasing number and accumulation of reports is a curse to American law.

There are great judges, and there are great decisions; there are many reported cases which are really the fountain of much that is important and necessary in law; but, on the other hand, there is a vast quantity of reported cases, some of which are good, some of which are indifferent, and some of which are execrable. The Senator from Montana, one of the ablest and one of the most industrious lawyers I ever knew, will, I think, sustain the proposition that no important legal question comes to him for solution that does not, because of the multitude of cases, entail upon him a degree of labor that is necessary in a way but which ought not to be and would not be necessary if these cases had not been issued and circulated in published form.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, upon the assurance that the Senator speaks his earnest convictions, I desire to ask if he would like to see the body of the mining law that we have built up in the West swept out of existence and that we should be put back where we were when the present mining law was originally enacted?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Montana has asked me that question. The so-called law of the Apex, founded upon the mining statute of 1872, has been construed by all the courts in the mining West, and by the courts of the United States for 42 years, and we know less to-day about the meaning of that statute than we did before the first reported case construing it was handed down.

Mr. President, no better illustration of the position that I am assuming can be offered here than the character of our law of mining as it has been construed and reconstrued and then construed some more, and still other constructions reconstrued, until a man with an Apex case to-day has a job before him that equals a Chinese puzzle.

Take our laws on irrigation. There are Senators here who come from arid States where the laws of waters under our statutes were fairly plain until court after court passed judgment upon them, until the reports of those courts were published, and until we confronted the impossible task of reconciling them. So, for heaven's sake—I will take that out; I do not want to trespass upon the favorite expression of my friend, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]—but for the sake of the peace of the profession and for the welfare of business, which some Senators think is going to be harried to death, do not inflict upon them such a punishment as will be involved in the report of cases to be determined by this commission that you propose to create.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, my legal friend from Colorado refers to New Jersey. I will say that some of us laymen are getting——

Mr. THOMAS. I did not refer to New Jersey, but to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well. I only have to say that some of us laymen are getting great comfort out of the entanglements which my friend demonstrates are impending on our land from the overadjudication of our law. I feel that the public at least will agree with me, in view of the thoughts advanced by the Senator from Colorado, that consideration should be given to the sentiment expressed by the fellow who said "Here's that every preacher may kill a lawyer and be hanged for it." [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Jersey is in no danger, because I do not think he ever was or ever will be a lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, while I am in sympathy with the purposes of this bill, I find a good deal of trouble in reconciling myself to a proposition embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], also in the one offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and in the one presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. In every one of these amendments it is—

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

While I have listened with all the charity I could to the explanations given for destroying the value of these orders and judicial decisions, I am not persuaded.

I notice in what is called the Clayton antitrust bill, of which there are many prints, that there is a provision known as section 6, in which, with great care, they preserve the value of every decision, so that it may be utilized in other litigations; but in the amendments to which I have referred by this exclusive language we practically destroy the value of a decision, no matter how many years have been occupied in bringing it to a culmination or how enormous has been the expenditure incurred. No matter how necessary it may be to some poor litigant who is struggling against the identical abuse decreed against in a given case—an abuse he may be suffering from at the hands of the same corporation—although the Government has litigated everything and has secured a decision of which he might, if the language of the statute would permit, have the benefit, he is excluded in this bill from having any benefit whatever. Its whole effect is to circumscribe and confine a decision to the particular issue in that particular case. I can not, somehow, believe that that is a limitation which we ought to incorporate in the law. In the antitrust bill, section 6, I read as follows:

SEC. 6. That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States under any of the antitrust laws there shall have been rendered a final judgment or decree to the effect that a defendant has entered into a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce, or has monopolized, or attempted to monopolize or combined with any person or persons to monopolize, any part of commerce, in violation of any of the antitrust laws, said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

And in the pending bill——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from South Dakota has not been here at all times; and I will ask, does he understand that that amendment has already been adopted by the Senate?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The amendments to which I am calling attention are one offered by the Senator from Ohio and another offered by the Senator from New Hampshire containing this language:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Mr. WALSH. I am asking the Senator, does he know that this amendment simply embodies that language, the same language having already been adopted by the Senate?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Adopted by the Senate in the pending bill?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, how do you harmonize the language of the two provisions?

Mr. WALSH. The amendment is offered as a substitute for section 5. Section 5 has already been amended by incorporating therein that language, and it is simply carried into the amendment now proposed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why is it necessary in the amendments which are submitted to us now to have the language which I read, for instance, in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator if he knows that the Senate has already adopted that language?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not, as a matter of fact; but if the Senate has, my query is still pertinent. Why do we insert this language? Is it proposed to adopt this language in the pending amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. If I may answer the Senator from South Dakota, I will say that the amendment referred to by him has already been adopted by the Senate by a vote of 40 to 13, which seems to be a very fair index of the way the Senate looks upon it. When I prepared my substitute, naturally I did not want to encounter any more opposition than was necessary; so I inserted whatever the Senate had already adopted, and made it a part of my amendment. I do not care much about that particular amendment, but I can state the reason for it, I think.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, if the Senator will permit me, I want to get myself located. If I understand correctly, what I have just read from what is known as the Clayton antitrust bill has been adopted as an amendment to the pending bill, known as the trade commission bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, what am I to understand?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I will endeavor to explain it to the Senator if he will permit me. The Federal trade commission bill has been before the Senate for several days, and a day or so ago the amendment to which the Senator has referred was adopted to section 5, so that those Senators who have proposed amendments to that section have embodied in them the amendment already agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am sure I was not here when the roll was called on that proposition.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I should like to explain to the Senator what I think to be the reason for the amendment. The provision which has just been read by the Senator from the Clayton antitrust bill involves a completed monopoly, a completed restraint of trade to be prosecuted under the solemn penalties of the Sherman antitrust law, and it is to be presumed that when a man is attacked under the Sherman antitrust law he will put his best foot foremost and make all the defense that he has. Under the trade-commission bill there is no pnalty, except an injunction; there is no punishment of any kind; and a man might well be excused for saying, "Well, I do not think this amounts to very much, and I will not trouble much about it; but I will go up and hear what they have to say." He will have a right to appeal in any event, if the pending amendment is adopted. The Senator can well see that under such circumstances a man might not put on all his witnesses or produce all his evidence, not thinking that the charge of employing an unfair method of competition was as serious as a charge of having created a monopoly or having restrained interstate commerce, for which he might be put in jail. That is my reason for thinking that this amendment is wise.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, if this matter is foreclosed, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily; but I think it is a mistake. I hold in my hand, and I am going to ask to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without reading, a letter, a copy of which I presume every Senator has received, written to the President of the United States by Mr. Gustavus A. Rogers, a gentleman with whom I am not acquainted, who was of counsel in some motion-picture litigation, together with a letter from the then Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, attached to it, showing, to my mind, one of the gravest cases of unfair competition yet brought to light, just such a case as has been referred to in connection with this bill, and just such a case as is sought to be reached by this legislation.

I do not know what the present status of this litigation is, but that is immaterial; it will illustrate the thought I have in mind just as well. Suppose after a long series of years which may have involved as much expense and struggle and litigation as the suit against the Tobacco Trust or the suit against the Standard Oil Trust, an action brought under this bill which we are now proposing to enact had resulted in a finding that the Motion-Picture Trust was guilty of unfair competition; suppose that enormous expense had been incurred; that the matter had ran through a long period of time, perhaps several years, and finally the commission had found deliberately that the Motion-Picture Trust was guilty of unfair competition under this law; that then that trust went into court to have the order of the commission reviewed by the court, and that the case had pursued its long and tortuous career through all the courts in which it could be heard, and finally it had been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States that the trust was guilty of unfair competition in violation of this act. That has settled the issue between the United States and the Motion-Picture Trust; but here is John Brown, or John Smith, or John Jones, who wants to get motion-picture films, and who in some subsequent proceeding desires the benefit of the decision which has been rendered in the previous case. He has not the money to incur the enormous expense of relitigating this whole subject, and here is a finding of the commission and here is the decision of the highest tribunal of this land in a case in which this whole matter has been thrashed out, and yet he can not use them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the provision does not touch such a case at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Simply because it does not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not referring to the antitrust act. I say, suppose under the trade-commission bill an action were brought against the great Moving-Picture Trust, accusing it of unfair competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. The provision to which the Senator has referred would not preclude the use of the order of the commission or the judgment of the court in such a case.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; but in any subsequent proceeding brought against that trust under the antitrust law this provision would not allow the previous finding or judgment to be used.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Government of the United States brings a suit under the antitrust law of 1890, this provision would prevent the judgment of the commission or of the court being used in that case.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; or if a suit were brought by an individual to recover damages.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not for unfair competition, because such a suit can not be maintained under the antitrust law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It looks to me as though we are closing the doors unnecessarily to a class of people who may be absolutely helpless because of their lack of financial ability to prosecute a separate action. After a proceeding is had before the commission, the issue is fought out, and judgment is obtained, why should not it be available, just as judgments and decrees are available in all other procedure, without any limitation?

Mr. CUMMINS. It will be, except that the judgment of the court or the judgment of the commission is not admissible in evidence in a suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senate has acted upon this matter, but I want to express my doubt about the propriety of such a provision being placed in the bill. I ask to incorporate a copy of the letter of Mr. Rogers and the letter of the Attorney General as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the letters which he sends to the desk may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, July 27, 1914.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: May I have your permission to place before you a situation which, I believe, will have some points of interest to you in your very commendable campaign in the interest of the people as against the "big interests" that are unlawfully operated in the form of vicious monopolies?

While the matter to which I will refer herein is a recital of facts regarding the so-called Motion Picture Trust, I am convinced that its operations are illustrative of what is generally being resorted to in other fields of industry and endeavor, prompting me to make the following recommendation for your consideration:

(1) That the word "hereafter," in section 6 of the antitrust bill, be stricken out, so that it shall read as follows: "That whenever suit or proceedings in equity brought or now pending * * * such judgjudgment or decree shall * * * constitute prima facie (conclusive) evidence of the same facts * * *." (I am informed that "conclusive" in the original draft has been changed to "prima facie.")

(2) That the language in section 3, which now provides penalties only against the owner or operator of any mine, etc., who refuses arbitrarily to sell his products to a responsible person, firm, etc., be broadened so that it shall provide against the refusal to sell any commodity where there are trade relations between the parties sought to be terminated by a combination for the purpose of creating or furthering a monopoly.

(3) That the bill provide that where trade relations have been once established between parties, it be not only unlawful to terminate these relations or refuse to sell the commodity for the purpose of creating or furthering a monopoly, but that the injured party may have a preliminary and final injunctive relief under the act compelling the continuance of the delivery of the commodity.

Prefatory to my further statement I beg leave to be permitted to say that I understand from newspaper reports that you are being importuned to suggest a modification of some of the provisions of the Clayton bill now before the Senate for action.

To my mind weakening any part thereof would be an unfortunate step, and I believe it should be made more comprehensive, as above suggested, in support of which I beg leave to refer you to my statement before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives on its hearings on trust legislation, and which appears in the printed report at pages 470 to 502, inclusive, volume 1, together with a list of recommendations which I submitted and which appears at page 1777, volume 2, together with the opinions of Judge Hand and Chief Judge Lacombe, which appears at pages 1778 and 1779, volume 2.

A reading of the matter to which I refer immediately demonstrates that unless some specific statutory provision is made preventing persons or corporations controlling a considerable percentage of a commodity from refusing to sell their goods to a purchaser who applies in good faith to buy on the same terms that they are selling to others that the small business man had no hope of remaining in his business should the combination seek to prevent him from doing so either in its own interest or because of some dislike to the intending purchaser.

The effect of some of the operations of the General Film Co. is referred to in House Report No. 627, which appears at page 1965 of the printed volumes above referred to, the pertinent portion of which reads as follows:

"Where the concern making these contracts is already great and powerful, such as the United Shoe Machinery Co., the American Tobacco Co., and the General Film Co., the exclusive or 'tying' contract made with local dealers becomes one of the greatest agencies and instrumentalities of monopoly ever devised by the brain of man. It completely shuts out competitors, not only from trade in which they are already engaged, but from the opportunities to build up trade in any community where these great and powerful combinations are operating under this system and practice. By this method and practice the Shoe Machinery Co. has built up a monopoly that owns and controls the entire machinery now being used by all great shoe manufacturing houses of the United States. No independent manufacturer of shoe machines has the slightest opportunity to build up any considerable trade in this country while this condition obtains. If a manufacturer who is using machines of the Shoe Machinery Co. were to purchase and place a machine manufactured by any independent company in his establishment, the Shoe Machinery Co. could, under its contracts, withdraw all their machinery from the establishment of the shoe manufacturer and thereby wreck the business of the manufacturer. The General Film Co., by the same method practiced by the Shoe Machinery Co. under the lease system, has practically destroyed all competition and acquired a virtual monopoly of all films manufactured and sold in the United States. When we consider contracts of sales made under this system, the result to the consumer, the general public, and the local dealer, and his business is even worse than under the lease system." (The italics of the "General Film Co." are mine.)

Briefly stated, what occurred in the motion-picture film industry is: That in the latter part of 1908 all of the then manufacturers of the American-made film, 10 in number, combined, got out a form of so-called license agreement on pretended patents (I say pretended, because the main patent had been declared invalid in the first place by the Federal court of the southern district of New York, and later its invalidity was also declared by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia), and gave the dealers their choice between subscribing to this agreement, most harsh and arbitrary in its terms, or getting out of the business entirely for want of a supply of the commodity.

Among the more drastic provisions of the agreement were:

(1) That those dealing with the so-called licensed manufacturers (the combination which then controlled at least 95 per cent of American-made film and a large percentage of the foreign importation) would not be permitted to deal with or handle any other film.

(2) That the film which had theretofore been sold outright would thereafter be leased, and by artifice compelling the dealers to return to the manufacturers the film which they then had on hand and which they owned outright, and replacing it in the future with films which were only leased by the manufacturers, so that when the combination got ready to cut off the supply the dealer would have no other film with which to compete.

(3) A provision under which the manufacturers claimed the right to terminate the agreement, with or without cause, on 14 days' notice.

After driving the dealers into signing this agreement, the manufacturers thereupon formed a company known as the General Film Co., to which the manufacturers agreed to make its supply, the company being organized on paper and with little or no capital stock actually paid in, and thereupon proceeded, by means of the agreement and its power, to drive all of their dealers out of business. This was usually accomplished by an enforced sale under threat of invoking the 14 days' termination clause in the contract.

There are many instances referred to in the record in the Government action, to which I shall hereafter refer, in which notice was sent to take effect immediately, without giving the dealer 14 days' time and destroying him immediately, his customers being taken up by the General Film Co. On the enforced sale it was not a cash transaction with the General Film Co., but, on the contrary, they forced the man to turn his business over to it and then agreed to pay him certain installments extending over a period of five years, and gave him some preferred stock in the company. As a result of these operations, in the space of little more than a year every one of the dealers in the United States, of whom there were about 150 in number originally, were bought up or arbitrarily driven out without buying them up, until there remained only one, our client, i. e., the Greater New York Film Rental Co., which the General Film Co. tried to buy out in the autumn of 1911. Our client refusing to sell, an attempt was made to terminate the agreement and refusal announced by the manufacturers to deal further with our client.

We thereupon took the matter to court, and through the process of the State supreme court, and the injunction order of his honor Learned Hand, of the Federal court of the southern district of New York, we succeeded in compelling delivery of the film by these manufacturers until February, 1913, when the manufacturers again announced their refusal to deliver films to our client in the interest of its own company, i. e., General Film Co. Whereupon, the Department of Justice, Mr. George W. Wickersham at that time Attorney General, writing under date of February 20, 1913, to Mr. George R. Willis, of counsel for the General Film Co., directed the manufacturers during the pendency of the suit instituted, on our complaint in the meantime, by the Government under the Sherman Act, to do business with our client, the Greater New York Film Rental Co. under the same terms and conditions as it was doing business with any of the branches of the General Film Co. and to make no discrimination against our client and in favor of the General Film Co. The portion of the letter referred to reads as follows:

"Of course, while the suit brought by the United States against the Motion Picture Patents Co., and others, is pending, the department expects each of the licensed manufacturers and importers, each of whom is a party to such suit, to do business with the Greater New York Film Rental Co. on the same terms and conditions as it is doing business with any of the branches of the General Film Co. and to make no discrimination against the Greater New York Film Rental Co. and in favor of the General Film Co."

I am attaching a copy of the letter for your perusal.

For a short time after writing the letter, the manufacturers, possibly under the advice of their counsel, complied with the request therein made, continued to make deliveries, but in the autumn of the same year they resorted to the subterfuge of getting out so-called special or exclusive films, which were widely advertised by the manufacturers as being supplied exclusively to or by the General Film Co., and since our client was the only remaining competitor of the General Film Co. was equivalent to advertising that our client could not get these goods.

Having arranged this plan, the General Film Co. began to and did use these special goods to induce the customers of our company to leave it and become customers of the General Film Co. That was accomplished by offering the special features free of charge, or else by giving them free to some competitor of our client's customers free of charge to use in competing against the other man's business.

In the Government suit there was direct testimony of at least one employee of the General Film Co., and in the suit between my client and the General Film Co. testimony of another employee, to the effect that they were instructed specifically as employees of the company to use these special features to win away the customers of our client. I could recite a great many other instances of this method of unfair competition employed at a time not when the Government agency was inactive, for however reprehensible it would be before that time, the conduct becomes more objectionable when I tell you that these things which I am reciting have occurred since the action was instituted by the Government.

Before I close I would like to call your attention to an incident of recent occurrence. Lately a demand was created for a certain type of film known as the Pickford films, manufactured by one of the ten in the combination. Our client ordered a quantity of these films from that manufacturer, i. e., the Biograph Co., and they were told abruptly and in a letter in cold type that the manufacturer refused to deliver them—this despite Mr Wickersham's letter referred to. In addition to its refusal, the Biograph Co. circularized the exhibitors, as I am informed, throughout the United States with the information that the Pickford film which had been previously manufactured would now be reissued, but distributed exclusively by the General Film Co.

NOTE.—The Biograph Co. referred to (one of the manufacturers in the combination) and the General Film Co. (the sole selling agent of the 10 combined manufacturers) have a common officer, to wit, Mr. Jeremiah J. Kennedy, who is the president of both companies. The holding company owning the patents, i. e., the motion picture patents, and the Biograph Co., have a common officer, i. e., Mr. Harry N. Marvin, who is the vice president of both companies. The General Film Co. and the manufacturers have common officers, for the principal officer of every of the manufacturers is also a director of the General Film Co.

The recital of this situation carries its own force, and I will not burden you with a characterization of it, but will leave that to your experienced and trained mind.

Of course, my object in writing this letter to you I hope will not be construed as a mere recital of the wrongs or grievances, actual or fancied, committed against my client, nor as a reflection or criticism upon the conduct of any public official, although I must say that no better handling of the situation could have been expected by the people of this country than that of Mr. Edwin P. Grosvenor, Assistant Attorney General, who had charge of the prosecution of the Government suit, and the masterly way in which it was generally handled by the Department of Justice.

The purpose intended to be served in writing at this time to you is that since I have observed in the newspapers that you have received delegations from time to time and that you are to receive another on Wednesday next who seek to convince you that the bills as presently drawn or contemplated are either too drastic or that their effect would be serious to the business interests of the community, that you might, honored sir, have before you to combat their argument some concrete examples of the operations of powerful combinations when they are unrestrained and unbridled by law, or believe themselves so to be. What higher demonstration can there be of the disregard of the well-being of another man than what I have put before you in this letter as the nefarious practices and operations engaged in at a time when the defendants were actually in a court of equity, being brought there by the Government for an alleged past violation of law? The explanation can be found only in that their acts are the expression of the belief in the minds of those engaged in these operations or those advising them that no law presently prevents this conduct, however wrong it may be. If this be so, all fair-minded men must agree that the time has come to change the law, so that these practices shall come within the condemnation of both the civil and criminal laws, if they do not now.

May I without further imposing on your patience add a few additional paragraphs as argument in support of the three recommendations I submit to you?

As to the first, the proposed legislation as framed in actions now in court at the suit of the Government under the Sherman Act, the decree would not be available for use by injured parties in private suits. To my mind this seems wrong on principle. In a large number of suits now pending undoubtedly the Government will be successful. The prosecution of these suits has cost the Government several hundred thousand dollars, the expense of which would have to be incurred over again by private individuals to get an adjudication in suits for damages under the treble-damage provision. In many instances, if not in nearly every one the cost of this litigation is so expensive as to be almost prohibitive. No good reason can be advanced from an economic standpoint as to why injured parties should not have the benefit of decrees that may hereafter be entered in suits already brought. I am advised by others and my own research leads me to the conclusion that no constitutional question can be raised against provision being made for the use of decrees hereafter entered in Government suits now pending as evidence in suits hereafter brought by private parties. The legislation would not be ex post facto, and merely relates to a rule of evidence or procedure.

My views upon the subject are shared by Special Assistant Attorney General Grosvenor, whom I am informed has written a letter on the subject, under date of May 14, 1914, to Judge Clayton, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, in which he recommends that the word "hereafter" be stricken out of section 3. I assume the letter is on file with Judge Clayton's committee. I have not a copy thereof or I would transmit it. I believe that Mr. Grosvenor's connection with the Department of Justice for several years and his activity in the Harvester, the Bathtub, and the Motion Picture Trust suits, which were in his charge, entitle his suggestion to serious consideration.

As to recommendations 2 and 3 that I have made, it must be apparent that in a situation such as I have described in the pages of this letter the instrumentality which makes monopolistic combinations so complete and secure in their operation and the achievement of the result they seek, is the power given to cut off the supply of its commodity at a moment's notice, thereby compelling its customer or competitor to yield to every wish and exaction of the combination formed against him and the people generally.

Take away from the trust the right to arbitrarily refuse its commodity to responsible persons and you uproot the very foundation on which the combination stands and you also destroy the most oppressive instrumentality it employs.

The State and Federal courts have ruled that a person can not be compelled, in the absence of contractual obligation, to maintain business relations with another, and unless this obligation is created by statute the evil practice can not be prevented unless the courts shall in future cases determine that the obligation exists irrespective of statute, a view for which I have always and still contend for.

In closing, I desire to give expression to the thought that I realize that representation is being made by the business men throughout the country that an attempt at legislation at this time, drastic in its nature, would involve us in business depression and possible panic, and that the interests of the people at large demand that cautious action be taken. While I am mindful of the duty that we owe as citizens of our country to prevent it being plunged into financial disaster, if the term is not too strong, I can not subscribe to the argument advanced, for I believe that we are at a point in our economic career which requires that we should either have a complete surgical operation, forever removing the evil business growths about us, and preventing their recurrence; or confess that the disease of depredation prevalent has such a firm hold on us that we must submit resignedly to "big business" and "big interests" for fear that otherwise they will make their disfavor apparent to the detriment of the people and the Government. I, for one, refuse to believe that any man, or any set of men, however numerous or financially great, are entitled to occupy such a position of power in our country and under our system of government. I know that you will not be misled by such specious argument. It may be that if you stand firm and insist, as our Chief Magistrate and Executive, that the statute shall be written on the books in no uncertain language, that the country and possibly even you may suffer temporarily; but the lasting good and benefit that will eventually and surely come will place upon your head a crown of esteem and respect that no man will dare to attempt to remove; the present and future generations will profit thereby; the door of opportunity in trade now closed against the poor and small business man will be opened for him, and new hope will be kindled that will create an unequaled era of prosperity.

Again apologizing to you for the length of this letter and thanking you for such consideration that you may give the subject, I have the honor to subscribe myself.

Obediently, yours,

GUSTAVUS A. ROGERS.

COPY OF LETTER OF FORMER ATTORNEY GENERAL HON. GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM RELATING TO A CONTINUANCE OF THE SUPPLY OF FILM TO THE GREATER NEW YORK FILM RENTAL CO.

FEBRUARY 20, 1913.

GEORGE R. WILLIS, Esq.,
239 Cortlandt Street, Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIR: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, addressed to Mr. Grosvenor, relating to the cancellation by the Motion Picture Patents Co. of the license of the Greater New York Film Rental Co.

I note your statement that in view of the conference at this office on February 18, 1913, the directors of the Motion Picture Patents Co., who issued the notice to the Greater New York Film Rental Co., have decided to withdraw that notice, and to notify the licensed manufacturers and importers of such withdrawal, and to withdraw the notices instructing licensed manufacturers and importers that they were not authorized to supply motion pictures to the Greater New York Film Rental Co. after February 28, 1913. This action is satisfactory to the department.

I desire, however, to direct your attention to that paragraph in your letter in which you state that the Motion Picture Patents Co. is not empowered to force the licensed manufacturers and importers to supply motion pictures to the Greater New York Film Rental Co., and that if any licensed manufacturer or importer should refuse to supply motion pictures to the Greater New York Film Rental Co., such an act of any licensed manufacturer or importer should not preindice the Motion Picture Patents Co. or its directors, and such refusal ought to be considered by the Department of Justice on its own merits as to the act of the manufacturer or importer so refusing.

Of course, while the suit brought by the United States against the Motion Picture Patents Co. and others is pending the department expects each of the licensed manufacturers and importers, each of whom is a party to such suit, to do business with the Greater New York Film Rental Co. on the same terms and conditions as it is doing business with any of the branches of the General Film Co., and to make no discrimination against the Greater New York Film Rental Co. and in favor of the General Film Co. If any of the licensed manufacturers or importers should so discriminate, in the apparent effort to accomplish the purposes set out in the Government's petition and therein alleged to be unlawful, it may be necessary for the Department of Justice to apply for a temporary injunction in the suit, or to take such other action under the Sherman Act as may seem expedient in the premises.

I am sending copies of your letter of the 19th, above referred to, and of this letter, to each of the counsel representing one or more of the defendants in the suit, and also copies to counsel for the Greater New York Film Rental Co.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to inquire whether or not it would be in order to ask to have the question involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] divided, so that the Senate might vote first upon the amendment down to and including line 23 and then upon the part of the amendment covered by lines 24, 25, and 26, the last lines including the matter to which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] objects and to which many of us were opposed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unquestionably. The amendment presents two distinct propositions, which can be separated and a separate vote taken at the instance of any Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, I ask that that be done.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think I can simplify the matter somewhat by striking out, with the permission of the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can amend his amendment, no amendment to it having been offered.

Mr. POMERENE. By striking out lines 24, 25, and 26 on page 5 and then offering the amendment in lieu of all of section 5, save the amendment heretofore adopted, and to be inserted immediately before that amendment.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, what are the lines the Senator proposes to strike out?

Mr. POMERENE. The three lines embracing the matter to which the Senator objected a moment ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when we enlist in a man's war I think we ought to carry a man's weapons and use them with all the effectiveness of which we are capable. It seems to me that those who favor this amendment are verifying the classical allusion of Daniel Webster that oftentimes the conduct of the war does not come up to the sounding phrase of the manifesto.

I am not in favor of that part of section 5 which prescribes the court procedure, and I rather think I would prefer the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, if I were compelled to choose between the two. In my judgment, however, we are crippling the enforcement of the law when we adopt the pending amendment.

Passing now the question of the sufficiency of the law itself, assuming that "unfair competition" is a sufficient declaration of law, and looking only to the enforcement, I believe we ought to pursue one or the other of two courses—we ought either to clothe the commission with the authority to institute a suit in the courts of the United States for the enforcement of the law and to enjoin offenders, as we have provided in the antitrust act, or we ought to give to the action of the commission all the effect which under the Constitution we can give it. To make the commission simply the open door for reaching the court is, in my opinion, to impose upon both the public and the private interest an unnecessary and indefensible burden and to retard the execution of the statute with unreasonable delay.

I personally favor the policy that will give to the order of the commission all the effect which under our institutions we can give it. I desire to follow the policy of the interstate-commerce law and to give to the trade commission and its order all the authority and all the effect which we give to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining matters of unjust preference, unjust discrimination, or unreasonable rates. I believe we have the constitutional right to give the order that effect. I believe it will be for the welfare of business, for the stability of commerce, to do so, and I am sure that it will be for the general interest to do so.

I have an amendment, Mr. President, which I offered yesterday, and then withdrew in order to give opportunity for a further conference with regard to this particular subject, which, if it be in order under the rules, I shall present as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio; but if it be not in order at this time I shall offer it at a later time. This is a proper occasion, however, to express the difference between my view of the most effective procedure on the part of the commission and the view embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment which I shall propose is not essentially different from the amendment of the Senator from Ohio until we reach the stage of a finding and an order by the commission. In so far as the proceedings which occur before that time are concerned, the difference between the two amendments is largely a matter of phraseology; but then the separation begins.

I regret very much that I feel impelled to part from those with whom I have been associated in the defense of this bill. I have not forgotten the memorable struggle of 1906—a struggle that never will be forgotten by the people of the country; a struggle that continued on the floor of the Senate for days and for weeks—between those who were representing the views of the railroads, and those who were representing the views of the people. The issue was whether there should be what was then termed a broad review or whether there should be a narrow review of the orders and acts of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Those who were arguing the matter from the standpoint of the railroad companies insisted that the cases tried by the Interstate Commerce Commission should be tried de novo in the courts. Those who were enlisted on the side of making an effective statute of regulation insisted that the jurisdiction of the courts should be limited to the constitutional field; that is to say, that the action of the commission in determining what are reasonable rates and what are unjust preferences or discriminations should have some effect, and that, in so far as we could do it constitutionally, we should make the orders of the commission final.

I realize that we can not make the order of a commission final in all respects, and we ought not to make it final; but there is a vast difference between confining the jurisdiction of the court as narrowly as we can and opening it up to a complete new trial whenever we reach a judicial tribunal. The amendment which I have offered or will offer is fashioned upon the policy of the interstate-commerce law, and follows the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In my amendment it is provided that—

> If upon such hearing the commission shall find that the person, partnership, or corporation named in the complaint is practicing such unfair competition, it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the offender an order requiring that within a reasonable time, to be stated in said order, that the offender shall cease and desist from such unfair competition.

Then I provide, exactly as is provided in the interstate-commerce law:

> Any suit brought by any such person, partnership, or corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district of the residence of the person or of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located, and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

Senators will remember that the statute to which I refer here is the one which abolished the Commerce Court, restored the jurisdiction of the district court, and reenacted the procedure which should be followed in such cases.

This is not a fanciful difference. You will mark my amendment says that upon the entry of the order of the commission if any corporation or person aggrieved desires to bring a suit against the commission to set aside or annul its order he can do so, just as the interstate-commerce law provides; but the vital inquiry is, What may the court examine when a person aggrieved by the order of the commission institutes a suit of that character?

Under the amendment of the Senator from Ohio there is a retrial. It is a trial de novo. The order of the commission counts for nothing, except that it becomes prima facie evidence. That is keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. Prima facie evidence in a suit in equity in which all the evidence is before the court confers no advantage upon the person in whose behalf the findings are said to be prima facie evidence. The court must take the record as it is finally made and decide the case according to the very right of the matter.

There are some instances in the law in which the burden of proof is of value or where it is of advantage to have under the law a prima facie case upon a certain showing. It is not so in suits that are brought or will be brought to set aside or annul the action of the commission. It is technical rather than substantial. The real effect of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as I think he will concede, is to open to the court a retrial of the entire case upon its merits, just as it was contended in 1906 that when a railroad company assailed the order of the commission with respect to discriminations or with respect to rates there ought to be an open field and a retrial in any court to which the case might be brought.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Permit me to call the Senator's attention to this limitation: Under the provisions of the pending amendment, after the application is made, the proceeding in the district court will be based entirely and exclusively upon the record as made before the commission, except that the court above may permit the introduction of new evidence that was not known to the party offering it at the time of the trial below, or which, if known, could not have been produced with reasonable diligence. My belief is that that is going to place a limitation upon the number of new trials, and it avoids the temptation which exists in some jurisdictions where there are two trials of not in fact trying the case upon its merits in the tribunal below, but reserving the evidence until the last trial.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, Mr. President, perfectly. It is a mere detail. When finally the evidence has been taken and it has been laid before the court it matters not whether it was taken before the commission or whether it is subsequently adduced, the court has the record, and the court has a free, open field to enter just such decree upon the record before it as in its opinion ought to have been entered by the trade commission. It is precisely like the practice in my own State of an appeal from a justice of the peace to the district court.

I desire now to point out what the difference is.

Mr. STONE. Before the Senator enters on that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. STONE. If I correctly understand the Senator from Iowa in explaining his amendment, it follows substantially, if not literally, the methods of the interstate-commerce act, so far as courts are authorized to review the findings of the commission, and the Senator from Iowa contends that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio provides a different method of judicial interference, enlarging the power and jurisdiction of the courts over the action of the commission.

If that contention is true, if the Senator from Iowa is correct, then I submit to the Senator from Ohio this question: Why would it not be safer and in every way better to adopt that method of judicial procedure which has been tested out, which has been established, with regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts; in other words, to let exactly the same rule, as far as the courts go, apply in the case of the trade commission that do apply in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

I am assuming now that the criticism which the Senator from Iowa makes on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is correct, and that his statement of his own amendment is likewise correct.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to reply just briefly, the class of questions, both legal and of fact, which are triable before the Interstate Commerce Commission, while great in number, are not very varied in character. In the matters involved in the pending legislation we are seeking to correct methods of unfair competition. This legislation is criticized, and with great force, from certain directions, because we are not able to define definitely what unfair competition is. I recognize that uncertainty; but I also recognize the fact that the proposed bill is indefinite in that respect. It is no more indefinite than the law is now on the subject.

Recognizing that this criticism is justified in many respects, that the law is more or less uncertain, I, for one, am not willing to submit to the exclusive jurisdiction of a commission composed of five men without a reasonably complete method of review.

We do not know that this commission is going to be composed of trained lawyers, and I do not believe it ought to be composed entirely of trained lawyers. I recognize the fact that business men of great ability and experience may be of assistance upon this commission in deciding questions of fact. But I have never yet been able to arrive at that point where I am willing to ascribe all wisdom to five men because they may be called a commission and cast a reflection upon judges because they are called judges.

Until we are able to define more explicitly what unfair competition is, and until we are able to lay down some more specific rules than we seem to now, I want the corporation which may be ruled against to have an opportunity to have its rights adjudicated in a proper tribunal. For that reason, I believe that we ought to provide for a review somewhat after the nature of what has been set out in the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator not allow me just a moment to make a suggestion upon this particular question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can not help it, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri can have no doubt, after hearing the statement of the Senator from Ohio, that I accurately stated the real issue between these amendments. I do not, of course, believe that any commission that may be selected will be omniscient, neither do I believe that any court is omniscient, neither do I believe that either commission or court can be found entirely free from the possibility of mistake. The Senator from Ohio, however, in lauding the court and in rather disparaging the commission, left the inference that my amendment withdrew all jurisdiction from the court, and I desire at once to point out just what the court would be authorized to do, just what jurisdiction the court would have over the order of the commission under the amendment that I have proposed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I certainly did not intend to leave the impression that I was of the opinion that the Senator was trying to exclude the courts from the power to review entirely; by no means.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Delaware, if he desires to interrupt me at this point.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I thought just where we were brought by the question of the Senator from Missouri it might be well enough to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the method proposed by the Senator from Ohio of making the finding and order of the trade commission practically final, to be reviewed only as he will describe, is not the only method in which the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission are reviewable. There are two methods, one that proposed by the Senator from Iowa and the other in a case where the finding is for the payment of money, in which case there is practically a trial de novo in the district court, and, just as in the case of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, the order and finding of the commission is made prima facie evidence in the case.

In fact, I think the amendment of the Senator from Ohio goes further than in the other branch of appeals taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission in that the whole record, the transcript of the evidence, and the finding, and the order, are sent up and are all before the court, subject only to such additions as the person against whom the order is made may obtain leave to introduce by way of new evidence which could not be produced at the original trial.

I did not want the Senator from Missouri to understand that the method proposed by the Senator from Iowa was the only way in which any order of the commission could be reviewed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I still insist upon my statement. I know that the interstate-commerce law provides that upon the complaint of a shipper the Interstate Commerce Commission may ascertain whether there has been an overcharge or not, and if it finds there has been, it may determine the amount, and that then the shipper may sue the railroad company in the court, and then the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission is prima facie evidence of the amount due. But that has no relevancy or similarity to the question we are now discussing. Whenever the interstate-commerce law clothes the Interstate Commerce Commission with the authority to pass upon the lawfulness of any particular act of a common carrier, then the order of the commission, wherever it is challenged, has a certain effect, and it ought to have a certain effect, or it is idle to create the commission and go through the ceremony of trying a case before it.

I propose to find out just what effect under the interstate-commerce law an order, which is as nearly similar to the orders that are to be made by the trade commission as two human affairs can be, may have in the courts when they are called upon to revise or review the action of the commission.

I repeat, that under the plan of the amendment now pending there is practically a trial de novo.

I desire to call to the attention of the Senate the opinion in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Illinois Central Railroad. It is reported in Two hundred and fifteenth United States Supreme Court Reports, beginning at page 452. This case originated in a complaint filed against the railroad company charging it with unjust discrimination or undue preference in the distribution of its cars.

I want that to be remembered. The charge was unjust discrimination in the treatment of its patrons in furnishing them the cars necessary to carry on their business. I will not enter into the details of the charge, because its simple statement furnishes all the information that is necessary for the argument I am making.

I pause here a moment to recall some of the criticisms that have been made upon the phrase "unfair competition." The interstate-commerce law, in a part of it that has been enforced for years, declares it to be unlawful for a common carrier to unjustly discriminate. I would like to know whether that statement of the law is more certain or definite than unfair competition. Unjust discrimination. Some discrimination is permitted, but the commission is to determine whether the discrimination is unjust, and I would like to hear some of the ridicule, some of the sneers, and some of the wit that have been expended upon the phrase "unfair competition" expended on "unjust discrimination." I would like to hear some of the critics of this section attempt to define unjust discrimination.

Is there a Senator here, was there ever a writer or a student able to define "unjust discrimination"? No; it can no more be defined than "unfair competition." It can no more be defined than "undue restraint of trade." These phrases are primary. They all embody a principle, and it is nothing less than absurd to insist that in order to satisfy the demands of the law we must be able to define words that contain in themselves the primary meaning sought to be expressed.

I need not pursue that thought further, because it has been commented upon until it has become tiresome to the Senate.

I recall myself to the argument. In the case from which I am reading the complaint filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission was that the Illinois Central Railroad Co. had been guilty of unjust discrimination. The commission proceeded to the investigation and the trial of that cause, and it rendered a finding against the company. Thereupon the company brought its suit against the Interstate Commerce Commission, as it had a right to do at the time the suit was brought, although it would now, under the act of 1910, I think, be brought against the United States. It brought its suit against the Interstate Commerce Commission to set aside, annul, and cancel the order that had been made by the commission adjudging that the railroad company had been guilty of unjust discrimination in its dealings with the public.

Is there any difference between the finding of unjust discrimination and the finding of unfair competition? Is there any reason why a court should be given a broader jurisdiction or a greater right in reviewing the order of the trade commission, in finding one guilty of unfair competition, than there is for giving the court a similar jurisdiction in reviewing the finding of the interstate commerce tribunal that the defendant had been guilty of unjust discrimination? I can perceive no reason. It is utterly impossible for me to understand that there is a difference between these two cases.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. COLT. The Senator is speaking of unjust discrimination, and I desire to ask if unjust discrimination would not be largely a question of mathematics? For example, if a railroad company charged one customer 2 cents a mile—I am only giving a crude illustration—and another customer 2½ cents, you would have something to guide you, and the question would be whether this difference in charges was just under the circumstances.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where do you get anything to go on?

Mr. COLT. The question under those circumstances would be whether the discrimination was justified.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. COLT. Now, suppose a case arises involving unfair competition and I want to have the commission determine as to the legality of some of the practices which have been referred to in the decrees of the courts in cases arising under the Sherman Act, upon what principle are you going to determine whether these practices are fair or unfair? I will read a few of these practices:

> From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of such competitors of either of these defendants, so as to secure the trade of such customers, without regard to the price.
> From appointing or authorizing the appointment of any officer, agent, or committee of said Elgin Board of Trade, whether of one or more persons, to fix or suggest the price or prices of butter.
> From maintaining a quotation committee or any other committee or agency of said Elgin Board of Trade or its membership which shall fix a price or prices of butter.
> From making or causing to be made any offer to buy or sell butter on said Elgin Board of Trade at a price which has been agreed upon by any two or more of the members of said board or by any one or more of said members, and any other person or persons, prior to the making of said offer.

I really think the Senator from Iowa must admit that the phrase "unfair competition" is used in a legal as well as in a colloquial sense, and that its meaning is indefinite, vague, and indeterminate; that the phrase means one thing in the region of morals or good manners, while in the department of law it means quite another thing; at any rate, there being a dispute as to the meaning of this phrase, it does not seem to me fair to put it into a great statute affecting the business of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. COLT. I desire to quote a statement, if the Senator will pardon me, from a very eminent judge:

> To draw a line between fair and unfair competition—

This is in a case, I think, cited by the Senator yesterday—

> To draw a line between fair and unfair competition, between what is reasonable and unreasonable, passes the power of the court. Competition exists when two or more persons seek to possess or to enjoy the same thing; it follows that the success of one must be the failure of another, and no principle of law enables us to interfere with or to moderate that success or that failure so long as it is due to mere competition. I say mere competition, for I do not doubt that it is unlawful and actionable for one man to interfere with another's trade by fraud or misrepresentation, or by molesting his customers, or those who would be his customers, whether by physical obstruction or moral intimidation.

I merely wish to say one word more. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] as well as the Senator from Iowa spoke about the rule of reason.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want a reply to the Senator from New Hampshire interjected in my speech.

Mr. COLT. The Senator from Iowa said the other day that the difficulty as to the construction of the phrase "unfair competition" could be solved by the same rule of reason that was applied under the Sherman Act. The difference between the two cases, to my mind, is this: Under the Sherman Act, in applying the rule of reason you have principles to guide you; it is not the absolute reason of the judge; you have a foundation upon which to rest. The issue in these cases is a combination in restraint of trade or an attempt to monopolize, and the facts must tend to prove such a scheme or plan, a scheme or plan by which the defendant undertakes to get control of a certain article of commerce. The injury to the public from these combinations in restraint of trade and attempts to monopolize are enhancement of price, deterioration of the article, and limitation of output, as well as the further injury that the people are restrained from their liberty of trading in this article. That is monopoly in the sense of the Sherman law.

Under the rule of reason, as applied to the Sherman law, you have legal guides and principles to go by, but if a case of "unfair competition" came before the court I would ask how would a judge know what to do in the present condition of uncertainty as to the meaning of those words, and the different definitions which are given to them by the ablest Members in this body?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there have been no definitions given of "unfair competition" by anybody, and I hope no one has been or will be adventuresome enough to attempt to give a definition to those words, any more than anyone would attempt to give a definition of "fraud" or "reasonable" or "undue restraint of trade" or "unjust preferences." It is beyond the capacity of man to define any of these phrases, because they define themselves. There is difficulty in their application to a particular state of facts. Men will differ, employing the rule of reason, in their application to a given case. Judges all over the country have differed with regard to the application of the phrase "restraint of trade." One judge has held that a given state of facts constitutes a restraint of trade; another judge, sitting on the same bench, has decided by the same rule of reason that such given state of affairs does not constitute a restraint of trade. There have been scores of instances in which one judge has said that a given practice by a railroad company was an unjust discrimination, and another judge has said that the same practice was not an unjust discrimination. We can not conceive a law that all judges will apply to the same state of affairs in the same way. Possibly when we reach the heavenly shore—and I hope we all will reach it, in the long distant future—we may find that infallibility and unerring judgment that will enable us to reach a like conclusion upon a like state of facts, but we have not as yet attained that perfection.

I did not, however, rise to discuss the meaning of the words "unfair competition"; I rose to ask the attention of the Senate to a most important inquiry relating to the jurisdiction that we should give the courts over the orders of the commission. I have instanced now the character of the case from which I intend to read; and if anyone can perceive any difference in principle between that case and the action of the commission under the law that we are proposing to pass, I have yet to hear it stated.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I rose a few moments ago to address the Senator in relation to the matter to which he has just now arrived. The Senator recognizes, as a matter of course, the very essential difference between declaring existing rates or existing practices unreasonable and prescribing a rule for the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. A very great difference.

Mr. WALSH. The one is a judicial act and the other is a legislative act. To declare that an existing rate is unreasonable is a judicial act; to prescribe a rate which shall govern for the future is a legislative act. That legislative powers may be confined to a commission and its decision made final there can be no question. Now, is it not true that in the case the Senator is now canvassing the court prescribed the rule which should guide the railroad company in the future; and was it not the rule thus laid down to guide the company for the future that was attacked?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not in the sense in which the Senator from Montana uses that phrase. The essential part of the order was to denounce or condemn what had been done by the railroad company.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I want to read from the opinion. On page 470, the court said:

> The statute endowing the commission with large administrative—

Not legislative—

large administrative functions, and generally giving effect to its orders concerning complaints before it without exacting that they be previously submitted to judicial authority for sanction, it becomes necessary to determine the extent of the powers which courts may exert on the subject.

Beyond controversy, in determining whether an order of the commission shall be suspended or set aside, we must consider (a) all relevant questions of constitutional power or right, (b) all pertinent questions as to whether the administrative order—is within the scope of the delegated authority under which it purports to have been made, and (c) a proposition, which we state independently although in its essence it may be contained in the previous one, viz, whether, even although the order be in form within the delegated power, nevertheless it must be treated as not embraced therein, because the exertion of authority which is questioned has been manifested in such an unreasonable manner as to cause it, in truth, to be within the elementary rule that the substance, and not the shadow, determines the validity of the exercise of the power. (Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Adams, 155 U. S., 688, 698.) Plain as it is that the powers just stated are of the essence of judicial authority, and which therefore may not be curtailed, and whose discharge may not be by us in a proper case avoided, it is equally plain that such perennial powers lend no support whatever to the proposition that we may, under the guise of exerting judicial power, usurp merely administrative functions by setting aside a lawful administrative order upon our conception as to whether the administrative power has been wisely exercised.

Power to make the order and not the mere expediency or wisdom of having made it is the question. While, as we have seen, the court below reasoned that the transportation of coal bought from a mine by the railroad company for its own use, after delivery to it in its coal cars at the tipple, was not commerce, because "commerce under these circumstances ends at the tipple," it yet reasoned that such coal was within the control of the interstate-commerce law to the extent that a regulation compelling its consideration, for the purpose of rating the capacity of a mine as a basis for fixing its pro rata share of cars in times of shortage, would be valid. Because of this reasoning, it is insisted, it appears that the court below but substituted a regulation which it deemed wise for one which it considered the commission had inexpediently adopted, and this upon the assumption by the court that its authority was not limited to determining power. Without intimating an opinion as to the merits of the proposition, we put it aside as irrelevant, since we must decide whether the action of the court below was correct, irrespective of the reasoning by which such action was induced.

I need not pursue this opinion further, because what I have read indicates the definite conclusion of the Supreme Court of the United States with regard to the power of the court over the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This opinion has been followed in at least three cases, and in one of them the matter is reasoned upon and elaborated much more than in the opinion from which I have read, but it is in further application of the rule; and I think it is perfectly well known now among lawyers just what jurisdiction the courts can exert over the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whether they are orders establishing unjust discriminations or orders announcing railroad rates or orders with regard to the application of safety appliances to trains, or in any other respect in which the commission is given authority over common carriers.

All that I suggest is that we follow the same rule with regard to the trade commission and its finding of unfair competition that we have already adopted with regard to the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to unjust discrimination and other unfair or improper practices pursued by a common carrier.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he regards section 5, as reported in this bill by the committee, as providing for any court review; and, if so, to what question that review is confined?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have difficulty in answering that question. My objection to the form of the bill, as it now is, is this: In the latter part of the section it provides that if the corporation does not obey the order of the commission within a time to be fixed, thereupon the commission may apply to the district court of the United States, which shall issue an injunction to enforce the order. If the court should construe that to be a mandate upon it to issue an injunction, without any consideration whatever save the mere presentation, save to inquire as to the existence of the order, I should say that it would be unconstitutional, and would fall. I am not prepared to assert, however, that a court would nullify the statute on that account, for it might well hold that nevertheless the court could exercise all the jurisdiction which it must exercise to fulfill the Constitution. We ought not, however, to take any chances of that kind.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Assuming that it took the latter position, then, that it would have the power to assume such jurisdiction as it must exercise in order to carry out and enforce the Constitution, to what questions, then, would the court be confined, in the judgment of the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely those which I read a moment ago from the opinion of the Supreme Court.

Mr. NEWLANDS. First, as to whether the action was confiscatory?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is, after all, a matter of jurisdiction. If the court should find that upon the conceded facts there was no unfair competition, it would have the right to do it. It can do that, and does that, with the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If it should find that notice had not been given as required by the law, and that therefore the commission had not acquired the right to enter upon the investigation, it would annul the order. If it were to find that the commission acted arbitrarily, without any evidence to warrant its finding, it would annul the order of the commission. If, however, it found that the commission had acquired jurisdiction in the way pointed out by the law, and that there was fair, substantial evidence to sustain the order as to unfair competition, it would not substitute its judgment for that of the commission with respect to the sufficiency of the proof in establishing unfair competition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the Senator is of the opinion that if the facts were such as not, in the judgment of the court, to constitute unfair competition, it would deny the writ of injunction? Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it would have the right to do so under the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am speaking now of the bill as it stands.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would either deny the injunction or it would declare the law unconstitutional.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I ask the Senator whether the corporation has not every protection under the existing provision of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so, except through that tortuous interpretation to which we ought not to be driven. I think the provision in the bill is much more nearly what the provision should be than the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio; but we ought to cure the defect that is palpably there, so that we will be in no danger of meeting an overthrow when we reach the courts.

I hope the Senator from Nevada understands just what my position is.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand the Senator, in any event, whether it is a limited court review or a broad court review, the court can determine, first, whether the action of the commission is confiscatory in character and can annul it on that ground; second, whether it was within the limits of its authority, and can annul it upon that ground; third, whether the conceded facts constitute unfair competition, and if, in the judgment of the court, they do not, the court can annul the order or refuse to enforce it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not care to affirm the statement of the Senator from Nevada just as he has made it. I do not think the inquiry into confiscation will often arise under the "unfair competition" section.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is the question that will arise: Does the order of the commission take the property of the complainant without due process of law; does it deny to him some right which he may assert under the Constitution? In the pursuit of those inquiries the court will practically ascertain what has been stated by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LIPPITT. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, to be numbered section 5a; also an amendment to the pending bill to be inserted on page 15, after line 3; and I ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the fact that I suggested an amendment striking out a certain paragraph in the amendment which I submitted awhile ago, I ask that the amendment may be reprinted, as modified, for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reprinted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4261) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4845) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5207) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the port of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5446) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5575) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WEEKS presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Lawrence, Mass., regretting the action taken by the Senate of the United States in delaying the passage of the river and harbor appropriation bill, and favoring action thereon at the present session of Congress; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Blackstone, Fitchburg, North Attleboro, Boston, Fall River, and Haverhill, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Sanford, Me., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maine, praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to widows of Civil War veterans who were married since June 27, 1890, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Knox County Board of Underwriters, of Rockland, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting the use of mails in connection with the effecting of insurance in companies not authorized to do business in the several States, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch No. 209, National Association of Civil Service Employees, of Augusta, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. JONES presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Commercial Club of Walla Walla, the Commercial Club of Kennewick, and the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, all in the State of Washington, praying for the passage of the river and harbor bill at this session of Congress, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OWEN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oklahoma, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 6179) to pay Edward Booth $200 back bounty; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 6180) granting an increase of pension to Callie E. Kooken;

A bill (S. 6181) granting a pension to Seraphina Kain; and

A bill (S. 6182) granting an increase of pension to Ellen Milam; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 6183) granting an increase of pension to William Crouch (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6184) granting a pension to Frank Ferris (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6185) granting an increase of pension to Catharine Potter (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6186) granting an increase of pension to James N. Yates (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6187) granting a pension to Mathias Allacher (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6188) granting a pension to Mattie J. Johnson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6189) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Jefferson Stafford (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOCIAL INSURANCE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to introduce a joint resolution, of which I spoke yesterday, because it is necessary that it should be disposed of speedily if it is disposed of at all. I ask that the joint resolution may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) authorizing the President to accept an invitation and to appoint delegates to participate in the International Conference on Social Insurance was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act:

On July 30, 1914:

S. 485. An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

EXTENSION OF RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. LANE, and Mr. JONES conferees on the part of the Senate.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4261) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, 7, 13, 14, 15, 16, 19, and 20, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 18.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$36"; and the House agree to the same.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 30, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, O God our heavenly Father, for this day, with its gracious privileges. Strengthen us, we beseech Thee, that we may be able to discharge its obligations in accordance with Thy will and pleasure. In the spirit of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LEVER, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. LEE of Georgia), was granted leave of absence on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of woman suffrage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of woman suffrage. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I object. It is a State question; a State issue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] objects.

PAYMENT UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday it was voting on the Underwood amendment to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects. There was no quorum present, and that left it hanging up. The Clerk will report the Underwood amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 11, by adding, after section 15, a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 16. That from and after July 1, 1915, expenditures shall not be made for carrying out the purposes of the reclamation law except out of appropriations made annually by Congress therefor, and the Secretary of the Interior shall, for the fiscal year 1916 and annually thereafter, in the regular Book of Estimates submit to Congress estimates of the amount of money necessary to be expended for carrying out any or all of the purposes authorized by the reclamation law, including the extension and completion of existing projects and units thereof and the construction of new projects. The annual appropriations made hereunder by Congress for such purposes shall be paid out of the reclamation fund provided for by the reclamation law."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] demands a division. Those in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-four gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifteen gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 44 and the noes are 15. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] makes the point of no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the Underwood amendment will, when their names are called, vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 49, answered "present" 2, not voting 203, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. MORRISON (for the Underwood amendment) with Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers a motion to recommit which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moves to recommit the bill S. 4628 to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, with instructions to that committee to report the said bill back to the House forthwith, with the following amendments, to wit:

"Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause down to and including line 16, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'That any person whose lands hereafter become subject to the terms and conditions of the act approved June 17, 1902, entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, hereafter to be referred to as the reclamation law, and any person who hereafter makes entry thereunder shall at the time of making water-right application or entry, as the case may be, pay into the reclamation fund 5 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of the principal of said charge in 35 annual installments, the first 10 of which shall each be 2 per cent of the construction charge and the remaining 25 shall each be 3 per cent until the whole amount shall have been paid. In addition to the principal of the construction charge, there shall be paid in each case annually interest upon the balance of the construction charge remaining unpaid from time to time at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. The first of the said annual installments shall become due and payable on December 1 of the fifth calendar year after the initial installment: Provided, That any water-right applicant or entryman may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charges owing by him within any shorter period: Provided further. That entry may be made whenever water is available, as announced by the Secretary of the Interior, and the initial payment be made when the charge per acre is established.'

"Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'SEC. 2. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the terms and conditions of the reclamation law shall pay the principal of the construction charge, or the portion of the principal of the construction charge remaining unpaid, in 40 annual installments, the first of which shall become due and payable on December 1 of the year in which the public notice affecting his land is issued under this act, and subsequent installments on December 1 of each year thereafter. The first 10 of such installments shall each be 1 per cent and the remaining 30 installments shall each be 3 per cent of the total construction charge, or the portion of the construction charge unpaid at the beginning of such installments: Provided, That, in addition to the principal of the construction charge, there shall be paid in each case annually interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon such portion of the balance of the construction charge as remains unpaid beyond the time or times fixed for the payment thereof under the reclamation law in force when such land or entry became subject to the terms and conditions of such reclamation law: Provided further, That such person may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charge owing by him prior to the time herein required.'"

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-eight Members rising to second the demand.

Mr. MANN. If there is any question about it, I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was just figuring to see whether 48 was a sufficient number. Those opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and nine in the negative. Forty-eight being more than one-fifth of those voting, the yeas and nays are ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 140, answered "present" 2, not voting 209, as follows:

So the motion to recommit was lost.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. BRUCKNER with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. MILLER.

Mr. DEITRICK with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRIFFIN with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

On this vote:

Mr. AVIS (for motion to recommit) with Mr. CLANCY (against).

Mr. MORRISON (for motion to recommit) with Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington (against).

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. WALSH. No; I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify himself.

Mr. WALSH. I would have voted "aye," if I could.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference reports on the several bills, S. 5843, S. 5575, S. 5446, S. 4845, S. 4261, and S. 5207.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1048).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 5, 6, 7, 11, and 15, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, 10, 13, and 14.

Amendment numbered 12: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$36"; and the House agree to the same.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
GUY T. HELVERING,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, viz:

On amendment No. 1: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, on account of soldier's short service and the fact that he has some income aside from his pension.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes, as the evidence filed in support of the bill shows that the widow is in ill health and is unable to earn a living, and has practically no income outside of her pension; that her husband served more than three years in the Civil War and at his discharge was holding the rank of captain. The claim is a meritorious one, and the proposed increase from $12 to $20 fully justified.

On amendment No. 3: The House recedes, as the evidence filed justifies the allowance of the proposed pension of $12 per month to soldier.

On amendment No. 4: The House recedes, as the evidence filed in support of the bill shows that soldier's death was due to his service, and the proposed pension is fully justified.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence fails to justify the allowance of proposed increase of pension from $12 to $20.

On amendment No. 6: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as proposed increase of pension from $13 to $24 is not warranted by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 7: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as proposed increase of pension from $12 to $20 is not warranted by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 8: The House recedes, as soldier is shown by additional evidence filed to be almost blind and practically helpless and the owner of no real estate or property of any kind.

On amendment No. 9: The House recedes, as the circumstances disclosed by the evidence on file in support of this bill fully justify the allowance of proposed pension of $12.

On amendment No. 10: The House recedes, as the evidence in the case clearly shows that proposed pension of $12 should be allowed.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence is not deemed sufficient to warrant proposed increase.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing widow a pension of $36 per month. The Senate passed this bill at $40. The House struck the item from the bill. The widow is now pensioned at $30. The conferees believe the evidence filed in support of this bill fully justifies an allowance of $36 per month.

On amendment No. 13: The House recedes, as the evidence filed in support of this measure warrants the allowance to the widow of proposed pension of $12.

On amendment No. 14: The House recedes, as the proposed pension of $12 to widow is fully justified by the evidence on file.

Amendment No. 15 is a typographical correction.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
GUY T. HELVERING,
M. P. KINKAID,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1047).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5575) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 3, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$30"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$20"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5575) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, viz:

On amendment No. 1: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment at $30, as the facts in the case presented by the proof are not deemed sufficient to warrant an increase above said amount.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes, as the proof filed in support of the bill clearly shows that the proposed increase to $20 is justified.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate concurs in the House amendment of $24 per month, as the proofs do not justify a higher rate.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts presented by the proof are not deemed sufficient to warrant the proposed increase from $12 to $20.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proofs on the file do not bring the case within the rules of the committee relating to widows who married Civil War soldiers subsequent to the act of June 27, 1890.

On amendment No. 6: The House recedes, as the proofs filed in support of the bill show that soldier's death was due to his service and that the pension of $12 is fully justified.

On amendment No. 7: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing widow $20. This is to conform with the rule of the committee.

On amendment No. 8: The House recedes, as the evidence on file shows this claim to be meritorious.

On amendment No. 9: The House recedes, as the claimant is blind and the evidence fully justifies the allowance of the proposed pension of $12.

On amendment No. 10: The House recedes, as the evidence presented in support of the bill warrants the allowance of proposed pension of $12.

On amendment No. 11: The House recedes, as the evidence on file in support of this bill justifies proposed increase from $12 to $20.

On amendment No. 12: The House recedes, as the evidence filed in support of this measure fully justifies the allowance of the proposed pension of $12 per month.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1046).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5446) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 12, 14, 15, 16, and 17, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 5, 11, 13, and 18.

Amendment numbered 8: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$12"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and in lieu of the sum proposed therein insert the sum "$24"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5446) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, viz:

On amendment No. 1: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as widow was not the wife of soldier during his service and the facts in the case do not seem to warrant an increase of her pension from $30 to $40 proposed by the bill.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes, as it is shown by the evidence that soldier is suffering from paralysis, is totally blind in one eye and almost helpless, that he is without income, and unable to work.

On amendment No. 3: The House recedes, as the proofs show that soldier is suffering from paralysis and requires the aid and attention of another person.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts presented by the proof in the case do not seem to justify proposed pension.

On amendment No. 5: The House recedes, as proposed increase of pension is fully justified by the proof on file.

On amendment No. 6: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proposed increase of pension does not seem to be justified by the evidence presented.

On amendment No. 7: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proposed increase of widow's pension from $12 to $20 does not seem to be justified by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 8: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing widow $12 per month. The conferees believe the facts in this case fully justify the allowance of the pension of $12 to widow.

On amendment No. 9: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts presented by the proofs do not seem to justify proposed increase.

On amendment No. 10: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing soldier $24 per month pension. The Senate passed this bill at $30; the House struck the item from the bill. As soldier served more than one year in the Civil War and is shown by the files in the Bureau of Pensions to be suffering from rheumatism, disease of the heart, enlarged prostate, and double inguinal hernia, and to be totally disabled and prevented from performing manual labor, and is now past 74 years of age, without any property or income other than his pension, the conferees believe a rating of $24 per month is fully justified.

On amendment No. 11: The House recedes, as the proof on file in support of the bill show that claimant is crippled and is in such enfeebled condition that she needs the aid and attention of another person and that she has no income and is dependent largely upon contributions from charitable friends for her support. The case is a meritorious one and the allowance of the proposed pension of $12 is fully justified.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as soldier is dead.

On amendment No. 13: The House recedes, as it is shown by proofs on file that soldier is old and totally disabled and wholly incapacitated for the performance of any kind of labor, and by reason thereof is obliged to have a personal attendant most of the time. He has no property or income other than his pension for the support of himself and wife, and the proposed increase of his pension to $30 per month is fully justified.

On amendment No. 14: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts presented by the proofs are not deemed sufficient to warrant proposed increase.

On amendment No. 15: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proof does not justify an increase of soldier's pension to more than $24.

On amendment No. 16: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts in the case do not warrant a rating above $30.

On amendment No. 17: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proposed increase from $12 to $20 is not justified by the proof on file.

On amendment No. 18: The House recedes, as the facts in the case fully justify the allowance of $30 to soldier.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1044).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4845) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 5, 6, 8, 9, and 14, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 10, and 12.

Amendment numbered 11: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$40"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert the sum "$36"; and the House agree to the same.

On amendment No. 1: The House recedes, as the evidence on file with the bill shows that the widow is entitled to the proposed increase.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes, as the proofs on file in support of the bill disclose that soldier is clearly entitled to the $50 proposed.

On amendment No. 3: The House recedes, as the facts in the case justify the allowance of proposed pension of $12 to widow.

On amendment No. 4: The House recedes, as the evidence on file shows that soldier is almost blind and practically helpless and requires the care and assistance of another person, and that he is without property or income of any kind except his pension.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, on account of soldier's short service.

On amendment No. 6: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the soldier is dead.

On amendment No. 7: The House recedes, as the proofs on file disclose that the proposed pension of $12 to widow is fully justified.

On amendment No. 8: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, on account of soldier's short service and because he is an inmate of the Soldiers' Home.

On amendment No. 9: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as additional proofs filed show the proposed pension of $45 to be fully justified.

On amendment No. 10: The House recedes, as the evidence on file in support of this measure shows that the proposed pension should be allowed.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $40 per month to widow. The Senate had passed the bill at $50 and the House reduced this to $30. The conferees believe that $40 per month is fully justified by the proofs on file.

On amendment No. 12: The House recedes, as the proofs show that soldier is totally disabled and entirely unable to perform manual labor for his support and has no income other than his pension.

On amendment No. 13: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing widow $36 per month. The Senate had passed the bill at $50, which amount was reduced by the House to $24. The conferees believe that the facts in the case fully justify an allowance of $36 to widow.

On amendment No. 14: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the soldier is dead.

On amendment No. 1: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as soldier is dead.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes from its amendment, as soldier is shown by evidence on file to be totally disabled and to have no income excepting his pension.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence on file in the case shows that the amount of property owned by the beneficiary does not justify special legislation in her behalf.

On amendment No. 4: The House recedes, as the evidence on file in support of this bill fully warrants the increase proposed.

On amendment No. 5: The House recedes, as the evidence in support of the bill shows that soldier requires the aid and assistance of another person for his care, while for the past three months he has been confined to his room. He has no income other than his pension.

On amendment No. 6: The House recedes, as the proof on file in support of this measure discloses that soldier is totally disabled and has no income other than his pension.

On amendment No. 7: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the beneficiary is dead.

On amendment No. 8: The House recedes, as the proof filed in the case shows conclusively that the amount allowed by the Senate is justified.

On amendment No. 9: The House recedes, as the evidence on file in this case shows that soldier is totally disabled and has no income other than his pension.

On amendment No. 10: The House recedes, as it is shown by the proof on file in support of this bill that while soldier only had 86 days actual service, from the time he was enlisted until the time he was discharged 92 days had elapsed, and the proposed pension is justified.

On amendment No. 11: The House recedes, as additional proof presented in support of the bill shows that soldier has no income other than his pension and that he is totally disabled, and the amount proposed by the bill is fully justified.

On amendment No. 12: The House recedes, as the evidence on file clearly shows that proposed pension of $12 per month is justified.

On amendment No. 13: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, on account of the short service of soldier.

On amendment No. 14: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the statement as to claimant's financial condition is not considered sufficient to bring the case within the rules of the committees of both Houses as to destitution.

On amendment No. 15: The Senate concurs in the House amendment to reduce the amount from $30 to $24 per month, as the evidence on file does not warrant a higher rate.

On amendment No. 16: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts in the case presented by the proofs do not justify special legislation for claimant.

On amendment No. 17: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, with an amendment allowing $36 per month pension to the widow. The Senate proposed an allowance of $50 per month, which was reduced by the House to $24 per month. The conferees believe the evidence on file fully justifies the proposed allowance of $36.

On amendment No. 18: The House recedes, as additional evidence filed with the committee clearly shows that proposed pension of $30 is fully justified by the facts in the case.

On amendment No. 19: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as soldier is dead.

On amendment No. 20: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence shows that the widow is not in destitute circumstances and that special legislation in her behalf is not justified.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5207) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, viz:

On amendment No. 1: The House recedes, as the evidence on file fully justifies an allowance of proposed pension.

On amendment No. 2: The House recedes, as the proofs on file in support of the bill justify the allowance of proposed pension of $36 to soldier.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as beneficiary is dead.

On amendment No. 4: The House recedes, as it is shown by the proof on file with the bill that soldier is totally disabled and unable to perform manual labor for his support, and that he has dependent upon him an invalid wife, and no income other than his pension.

On amendment No. 5: The House recedes, as the evidence on file discloses that allowance of the proposed pension of $12 to the widow is meritorious.

On amendment No. 6: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing $24, which is believed to be justified by the evidence on file.

On amendment No. 7: The House recedes, as it is shown by the evidence on file that the allowance of the proposed pension is justified.

On amendment No. 8: The House recedes, as the proofs on file in support of the bill show that the soldier is totally disabled and unable to perform manual labor and has no income other than his pension.

On amendment No. 9: The House recedes, as the evidence on file in support of the bill fully justifies the allowance of the proposed pension of $30 to soldier.

On amendment No. 10: The House recedes, as the facts in the case, as shown by the proofs on file, show that the case is a meritorious one and that the proposed pension is justified.

On amendment No. 11: The House recedes, as the proof on file in support of the bill clearly shows that the proposed pension to the widow should be allowed.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, to conform with the rules of the committee.

On amendment No. 13: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the evidence on file discloses that widow is possessed of sufficient property that her case is not considered to come within the rules of the committees.

On amendment No. 14: The House recedes, as the facts in the case, shown by proofs on file, fully justify the allowance of proposed pension of $36 to soldier.

On amendment No. 15: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the proof fails to show facts sufficient to warrant proposed increase of pension.

On amendment No. 16: The House recedes, as the evidence filed shows soldier to be totally disabled and unable to work and without income.

On amendment No. 17: The House recedes, as the proposed allowance of $40 is fully justified by the evidence on file in support of the bill.

On amendment No. 18: The House recedes, as the evidence on file clearly shows the proposed pension of $30 to be fully justified.

On amendment No. 19: The House recedes, as the proposed pension is clearly shown to be meritorious by the proof on file.

On amendment No. 20: The Senate concurs in the House amendment with an amendment allowing soldier $30 per month, as it is shown that he is totally disabled and unable to work and has no income.

Amendment No. 21 is a typographical correction.

On amendment No. 22: The Senate concurs in the House amendment, as the facts in the case do not justify proposed increase of pension.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks upon the right of women to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on female suffrage. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to extend in the RECORD what was objected to the other day?

Mr. RAKER. What was that?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wyoming objected, and I see that he is here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from California intend to include in his remarks the statement of the premier, the Secretary of State, on this subject?

Mr. RAKER. That is my purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objection to having illustrious converts to the faith, the more illustrious the better.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether it would be perfectly agreeable to him to insert in connection with the statement of the Secretary of State the resolution or action of the Democratic caucus in this House, which the gentleman, of course, is familiar with?

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman that that will be taken up as a separate matter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California wants to have circulated, for political purposes in his State, the statement of the Secretary of State, which might lead people in California to think that the Democratic Party in the House was in favor of woman suffrage. Does not the gentleman think that in fairness to his constituents he ought to insert in connection with his speech the record of the Democratic caucus declining to favor woman suffrage and declaring that it was not a national issue?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from California that the Democratic caucus did not declare for or against woman suffrage. It was my resolution that the caucus adopted, and it simply declared that the question of suffrage is a State and not a Federal question.

Mr. MANN. That is what I stated when the gentleman said that the caucus took no such action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Secretary of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a letter from the Secretary of Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, in relation to what?

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. In relation to the statement issued by the Department of Commerce a week or so ago in relation to imports and exports.

Mr. MANN. I have been trying to get from the Department of Commerce for two months a statement which it issues and gives to the press. It no longer publishes its monthly information, as it used to. It says that it is willing to furnish it to me, but does not do so. Until it furnishes that information I shall object.

GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general dam bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 16053, the general dam bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1784) restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and tributaries.

GENERAL DAM ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last week the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] placed in the RECORD certain tables which related to the imports——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois to be well taken. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. In order, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not put that condition in his request.

Mr. MANN. I shall object unless——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to proceed for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has the floor for five minutes. I ask whether it is to be in order or out of order?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from Illinois is a bit previous in raising the question of order, for if there is one man who violates the rules of order in this House it is the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be lectured by the gentleman from Connecticut. I am not out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] placed in the RECORD last week on two occasions tables which related to the imports of breadstuffs into the United States——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That as a part of the conditions and stipulations such approval shall provide—

(a) For reimbursement to the United States of all expenses incurred by the United States with reference to the project, including the cost of any investigation necessary for the approval of the plans as heretofore provided, and for such supervision of construction as may be necessary in the interest of the United States.

(b) For the payment to the United States of reasonable charges for the benefits which may accrue to such project through the construction, operation, and maintenance in and about such streams by the United States of headwater improvements of every kind nature, and description, including storage reservoirs or forested watersheds or land owned, located, or reserved by the United States at the headwaters of any navigable stream for the development, improvement, or preservation of navigation in such stream in which such dam may be located. Such charges shall be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and to be based upon a reasonable compensation equitably apportioned among the grantee and others similarly situated upon the same stream receiving benefits by reason of increase of flow past their water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvements, the total charges to all such beneficiaries from any such headwater improvement not to exceed in any one year an amount equal to 5 per cent of the total investment cost in addition to the necessary annual expense of the operation of such headwater improvement.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk has read only paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 4, and under the rules I think the whole section should be first read before amendments are offered.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will complete the reading of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in the construction, maintenance, and operation of any project under this act for the promotion of navigation the grantee may, with the consent of the Secretary of War, use and occupy, when necessary for carrying out the project, lands acquired by the United States through purchase or condemnation and any part of the public lands withdrawn by the President from entry or disposition for the sole purpose of promoting navigation, which the President may do, as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases," approved June 25, 1910. For any of such lands so used the grantee shall pay to the United States such charges as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

(d) For the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable and just substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval, whenever the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory works.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language from line 24, on page 4, down to and including line 19, on page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 4, lines 24 and 25, and down to and including line 19 on page 5.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report the language which it is proposed to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the language proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment to the United States of reasonable charges for the benefits which may accrue to such project through the construction, operation, and maintenance, in and about such streams by the United States of headwater improvements of every kind, nature, and description, including storage reservoirs or forested watersheds or land owned, located, or reserved by the United States at the headwaters of any navigable stream for the development, improvement, or preservation of navigation in such stream in which such dam may be located. Such charges shall be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and to be based upon a reasonable compensation equitably apportioned among the grantee and others similarly situated upon the same stream receiving benefits by reason of increase of flow past their water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvements, the total charges to all such beneficiaries from any such headwater improvement not to exceed in any one year an amount equal to 5 per cent of the total investment cost, in addition to the necessary annual expense of the operation of such headwater improvement.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, can we not reach some agreement as to the time for debate upon this section?

Mr. RAINEY. I think I can get through in 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time will gentlemen on the other side of the aisle require on this section?

Mr. RAINEY. I mean on this amendment. I have two other amendments.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much more time will the gentleman want on the entire section?

Mr. RAINEY. I think I would like to have at least 20 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I have one amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better proceed for the present. There are several amendments to be offered upon this side.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no desire to cut off the offering of amendments.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think we can proceed a little better if we proceed on each amendment by itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is important that we should get through with this bill. I do not want to unduly cut off debate, but I think that the debate ought to be limited to five minutes on a side on each amendment, and I wish to give notice that I shall insist upon the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be drastic at all, but we have consumed lots of time in debate, and the whole subject has been exhausted. I would be very glad if we could have some amicable agreement for time on every section.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the quicker way would be to proceed in order on each amendment as it is offered.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an observation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT], who is here every session of the House and who seldom addresses the House, asked a short time ago to be permitted to proceed for five minutes. I think we had better have a quorum here to do business. There is not a Member of this House who is more faithful in attendance but who takes up less time than the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. DONOVAN. I am going to make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Oh, I ask the gentleman not to do that.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, what is the use of violating the rules forty times a day?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut insist upon his point of order?

Mr. DONOVAN. No; I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this is the one clause in the bill as reported by the committee which provides for revenue. At this point in the bill I intended, as I stated during the general debate, to move to strike out this entire provision for revenue and to substitute another provision similar to the Sherley amendment, which has already been adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is this provision in the substitute which the gentleman has moved to strike out——

Mr. RAINEY. I have simply moved to strike out certain language. I have not offered any substitute.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not understand me. The Clerk is reading the substitute?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman has moved to strike out certain language?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the provision which the gentleman moves to strike out in conflict with the Sherley amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. No; it is not in conflict with anything in the world. It is not in conflict with anything that anybody can possibly imagine.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean the gentleman's amendment, but I mean the provision in the substitute.

Mr. RAINEY. No; it is not in conflict with the Sherley amendment, nor with anything else, and that is the reason I am moving to strike it out. I intended to offer an amendment of my own similar to the Sherley amendment, striking out what I have now moved to strike out and inserting a provision similar to the Sherley amendment, but I am moving now to strike this out because it means absolutely nothing. The Sherley amendment accomplishes what I wanted accomplished. Every time the general dam bill is amended this particular provision is carefully rewritten, and it has been rewritten two or three times in this proposed bill before the bill has reached its present stage.

I do not think this clause ought to remain in the bill, thereby creating the impression that we at some future time expect to get revenue out of it. The Chief of Engineers holds that we can never expect any revenue from this clause, and I called attention during the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to the recent letter to me from the Chief of Engineers on this question. Here is an attempt to collect from dams located along a river returns for benefits they may derive from headwater improvements or reforested headwaters. There are no headwater reservoirs on any river in the United States except on the Mississippi River. The Chief of Engineers holds these reservoirs do not benefit in the least dams that may be below them, and in effect holds that no headwater reservoirs will ever benefit any dam so far as water power is concerned, because during the period of low water, and that is always in the wintertime, these storage reservoirs are closed in order to store up water for the ensuing period of navigation, and they therefore hold that headwater reservoirs do not do any good so far as the development of water power is concerned. The only other improvements that can possibly be imagined are reforested headwaters, and the Chief of Engineers holds it is impossible to determine from the data they have whether reforested headwaters will ever be of any assistance to water-power projects upon rivers below the headwaters so reforested, and in his letter to me, in effect, he states that there is only one way to determine that question, and that is to denude the headwaters of rivers, cut off all vegetation, and then make observations for a period of 100 years; then reforest the same hills and make observations for another period of another 100 years. Now, it will take 100 years, as anybody knows, to properly reforest these headwater sections again. Therefore, before we can determine whether the dams in the river where headwaters have been reforested will be benefited by the reforesting of the headwaters we will have to wait 300 years. I want to read what the War Department holds——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object to the request of my friend, but I think we ought to move along with this bill, and I stated before the gentleman started——

Mr. MANN. I think when debate is legitimate and a gentleman wants to discuss some amendment he ought to have five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection in the world to the gentleman proceeding, but we never will get through if we have unlimited debate in the committee; but as the gentleman had taken the floor I will yield to the gentleman's request, but after this I intend to insist.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama will remember——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor, and yet——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asked unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Alabama will remember when the matter of debate was under consideration it was stated that there would be fair liberality of debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to do that now, but I will say to the gentleman candidly what my purpose is. It is not so much the desire to push this bill. I know this bill will go to the Senate and be largely amended and come back finally on a conference report. If it goes through, these questions will be thrashed out, but I will say very candidly a good many Members want to get home——

Mr. MANN. I understand——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is following this bill, which can not come up until this bill is out of the way, the Moon bill in reference to railway mail pay and with reference to parcel post and other matters, and I would like it passed by the House before we agree that a quorum can drop out for a few weeks. Now, I am anxious to get this bill through.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but why not follow the custom which has prevailed largely, and I think quite successfully, in reference to this, and that is to limit the time for debate by unanimous consent and give gentlemen time who desire to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am very willing to do that if the House will agree on a reasonable time for debate. We spent two days in debating one item, and I think the first two or three gentlemen who spoke gave all that probably could be stated in reference to it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the gentleman from Alabama spoke in general debate, and then spoke again, and I do not know, but I thought, he gave us fuller information. The gentleman spoke and gave us all the information possible.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not speaking of general debate, but I am sure that my speech, if carefully read, will bring some information to the House, but I am anxious, if the House is willing, to agree to a reasonable amount of debate. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that general debate on this amendment close in 15 minutes, 5 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Illinois, 5 minutes to myself, to be yielded——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, since I am responsible for the numerous changes described, I think I ought to have an opportunity to say something, since I am responsible for the original proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will ask that general debate close in 30 minutes on this amendment, half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and half of the time by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not think we need take as much time as that. If the gentleman can be satisfied with 10 minutes I think we can be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, say 20 minutes.

Mr. LIEB. May I have five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate close in 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Does that relate to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] only?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Solely.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to read some extracts from a letter on the subject of headwater reservoirs and reforested headwaters from the Chief of Engineers:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, May 14, 1914.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: 1. Referring to letter of the 8th instant from Hon. H. T. RAINEY, M. C., to you, asking for certain information in regard to reservoirs and forests at the headwaters of navigable streams, and particularly with reference to the Mississippi River, I have the honor to report that no charges have ever been imposed by this department on the operators of power developments on navigable streams on account of any advantage which may accrue to them through the maintenance of reservoirs or forests.

2. There are extensive reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, which were built for the purpose of benefiting navigation. Whether the operation of these reservoirs in the interest of navigation will produce any beneficial effect on the power development at Keokuk is a question which has not been investigated, but it is known that the effect of the operation of these reservoirs is not beneficial to power developments at Minneapolis.

3. The season of lowest water on the upper Mississippi, i. e., the time when water is most needed for the power developments, is during the winter, the season at which navigation is closed. During this season the outlets of the reservoirs are closed to the minimum for the purpose of storing water in the reservoirs in order that it may be released during the low stages of the navigation season. The result is that the natural low-water flow during the winter is still further reduced, thereby reducing the amount of power which can be developed from the water wheels. These reservoirs are the only ones in the United States which have been built in the interest of navigation.

4. The effect of forests on the flow of navigable streams has been very thoroughly investigated by the Engineer Department in connection with the improvement of navigable streams, and these investigations fail to show that forests have any beneficial effect upon the stream flow, particularly during low water. I presume that before a charge should be made to the operators of a power dam on a navigable stream for additional water due to forests established at its headwaters it would be necessary to prove that the forests had contributed a definite additional flow to the low-water volume. The effect of forests on the flow of any stream can only be told by a series of observations extending over a sufficient period of time to eliminate changes due to varying amounts of rainfall. Such a series of observations should be not less than 100 years in length, and preferably longer than this, for each condition—that is, in forested and denuded condition—in order to arrive at any results which would be of positive value.

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers United States Army.

That is all there is to this. We can not expect the engineers to hold for at least 300 years that reforested headwaters would be of any benefit to power dams located on streams, and before that time we are liable to amend this bill again.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is a singular commentary on the progress of this bill. He moves to strike out one of the provisions inserted by the committee, because he does not think it will prove effective in raising revenue, and he objects to any method the committee proposes to raise revenue from the use of the property of the United States. When he previously brought the matter before the committee I addressed the committee briefly in the time of the gentleman from Georgia, and notified the committee that I did not take much stock in the original measure to acquire forest reservations at the headwaters of streams for the benefit of navigation, and I have not seen much reason yet to change my mind. But these reservations have been acquired for the benefit of navigation at an expenditure of $8,000,000, and we thought it was our duty to get the utmost out of them for power purposes as well as for navigation.

I am familiar with the situation on the Mississippi River and especially as to the use of the navigation reservoirs at its headwaters. After about 17 years' experience and participating in two careful investigations of these reservoirs I find the situation is this: Those reservoirs were constructed, six of the largest in the world, to provide suitable water at the head of navigation at St. Paul, at the levee, 18 inches of water, for about 100 days during the dry season of the summer, from about the 1st of July until about the 1st of October. That was the design of the reservoirs, and they have fulfilled their mission. They do send that amount of water down, and they have improved navigation. Now, the mills below those reservoirs necessarily use that water during the dry period of the summer, and it occurred to your committee that such water should equally benefit those mills, and they ought to pay for the use of that water which may benefit them during the summer. I know the mills will maintain that they receive no benefit from it. Of course they will, since they do not wish to pay for what heretofore they have received for nothing. But it seemed to me a matter of common sense that they do receive some benefit during the dry season of the summer and not during the winter. We never have claimed that they do receive benefit during the winter, but during the summer they do, and they ought to pay for it.

And it is not a question to be determined by the Chief of Engineers or any departmental official. The question is a question of fact and law to be determined by the courts, and one thing which we have done in the framing of this amendment is to make it compulsory that these charges shall be fixed from time to time by the administrative officials, compelling the engineers to make a record of what these charges should be, and fixing the standard from the benefits received. There are numerous gauges along the river that determine exactly how much water comes down, how much water is let out of the reservoirs, and how the water proceeds down the stream, and it can be accurately determined by measurement. So that will be a question for the courts to determine, and not for the Chief of Engineers. It will be his duty to fix a charge and to enforce it in the courts. The letter of the gentleman from Illinois amounts to nothing but the opinion of the Chief of Engineers. Other officials of other departments and of high standing differ on that point and believe that that value does exist. Nothing will settle this matter but the decision of the courts as to whether or not this provision will be made effective, and such benefits can be paid for by those who receive them.

One thing more. The gentleman remembers, and I presume that he voted for, the so-called Weeks bill when it was before the House. The claim was made that the bill was designed to benefit navigation. The United States has spent $3,000,000 in securing forest reserves in the Appalachian and White Mountain Ranges, and the basis of the contention is that these reservations do benefit navigation.

The Geological Survey and their engineers under the law are obliged to certify that they do benefit navigation. Undoubtedly that department differs from the opinions of the engineers. Now, if the waters from those reserves do benefit navigation, it seems extremely probable to me that they equally benefit water power. And the same question will be determined, not by the engineers, but by the courts, as to whether or not there is an actual benefit to these water powers.

I hold in my hand the July number of the Review of Reviews, in which there is an article by Philip W. Ayres, the forester of the State of New Hampshire, on this very subject, in which he shows at considerable length and force the benefits which will accrue to navigation and water power by means of these forest reserves. Of course he is a very ardent admirer of Mr. Pinchot and follows his doctrine. And he shows to his own satisfaction that this $8,000,000 has been wisely spent. And I will just read this sentence:

With this new use water power increases greatly in value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we ought to have a chance in order that this $8,000,000 should realize some benefit to the Treasury, some benefit to the people, and that the $2,000,000 expended upon the reservoirs should pay some benefits, and this amendment accomplishes that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] desire to use the rest of his time?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. I shall not need it all.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] the rest of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] expect to conclude in one speech?

Mr. RAINEY. I will conclude in one speech; yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, my view about this dam bill is that we want to put some restriction on it or we will not get capital to invest, and I do believe in doing the fair thing by the Government.

Now, the gentleman proposes to strike out the language that reads as follows:

For the payment to the United States of reasonable charges for the benefits which may accrue to such projects through the construction, operation, and maintenance, in and about such streams by the United States of headwater improvements of every kind, nature, and description, including storage reservoirs—

And so forth.

Now, I think the gentleman has the Mississippi River in his mind, and he is only talking about the Mississippi River, and he thinks there is no purpose in this proposition because he can not see much to be accomplished from the Government outside the Mississippi River. I am talking for the interests of my State, so far as paying part of this charge is concerned. I want to tell you of a concrete case.

The Alabama River flows through low land. It is difficult to build dams and dikes on it. The Coosa River flows into the Alabama. At the headwaters of the Coosa River, in the State of Georgia, near my friend's district, there is a possibility of making great storage reservoirs. The plans of the United States engineers to-day, for the purpose of creating navigation on the Alabama River, have in them that proposition and they have gone so far as to perfect plans, although no work has been done on them as yet.

They propose to make these storage reservoirs in Georgia that will let loose the water in the dry season, to furnish sufficient water to give annual navigation in the Alabama; that is, when the water flows low. Well, now, the water out of those reservoirs will come down the Coosa before it reaches the Alabama. It will go right through Lock No. 12 on the Coosa River, which is already built, which is already controlled by a private corporation, which is already furnishing light to the city of Birmingham; and if that plan is carried out it will not increase the present primary power in that dam, but it will make a great deal of its secondary power primary power, because a dam, of course, in the rainy season, has a greater flow and more water, which is called secondary power. That can not be used for lighting purposes or street-car purposes, but could be used for manufacturing purposes.

We had built these dams in the State of Georgia not in any way connected with the dam on the Coosa River, and really the plan was agreed upon before this dam was built originally by the engineers. It will increase the primary power of that dam very greatly. The power of the dam now amounts to about 10,000 horsepower. It has a very large secondary power because of the flow of water in certain seasons of the year. I do not know exactly—it is merely a guess on my part—but the building of these storage dams for the improvement of the Alabama River would probably increase the primary horsepower at that time 10,000 horsepower.

Now, all that this section says is that if that is done at the Government expense, these dams, located between the reservoir at the head of the stream and that part of the stream which is going to be profited by it shall pay a reasonable charge to the United States Government. Now, I did not agree to the Sherley amendment, because I think it will keep capital out of those dams, but I want to do what is fair to the Government of the United States, and if they build a reservoir at the head stream and it increases the primary power of that dam and is of benefit to the owner, I am perfectly willing, and I think it is perfectly just, that the owner of that dam should pay to the United States Government a reasonable contribution therefor. I think that is all that there is in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, it is amusing to me the strenuous manner in which these gentlemen, who were opposed to a compensation amendment that means nothing, insist upon this item in this bill, which has never meant anything and never will mean anything.

Now, there are storage reservoirs at the headwaters of only one river, and therefore I have discussed that matter in my correspondence with the Chief of Engineers, and he says that the reservoirs at the headwaters of the river are closed in the wintertime—that is the period of low water—and the water-power possibilities at a dam are regulated by how much power you can develop at low water. That is the only thing that counts, and the period of low water is in the wintertime, during the period when there are rains at the headwaters and when there are snows; during the season when they impound water they close these reservoirs. That is all there is to it. You can not get anything from reservoirs that will benefit dams downstream.

I have just read the holding of the Chief of Engineers to the effect that it will take 300 years to find out whether reforested headwaters will assist in the development of water power downstream. So what is the use of keeping this provision in here? This is a gold brick; it always has been and always will be. It is holding out to the people an evidence of strenuous efforts on the part of this Congress to collect something that never can possibly be collected.

We can not decide this question by reference to articles in the Review of Reviews nor by saying it should be referred to the courts. If it should ever get to the courts the opinion of our engineers would settle it there. They would testify that power dams would not be benefited by headwater reservoirs nor by reforested headwaters, and that would be the end of it, even if the questions were ever submitted to a court.

Now, if they have already found that the headwater improvements on the Mississippi River do not benefit the water power at Minneapolis, by what mysterious sort of reasoning will they find that dams located above Minneapolis will be benefited and therefore ought to pay? The same water that goes over the dams above Minneapolis comes down over the dam at Minneapolis. How can you keep this clause in this bill on the theory that at some time in the future those dams may be benefited when the department holds otherwise?

Now, I want this stricken out, because it means nothing and because it obscures the issue of compensation for the Government. The committee stands strenuously for this, which means nothing, and that is the reason, I think, they stand for it. They are opposed to the Sherley amendment, which means something, and that is the reason they are opposed to it. The Sherley amendment, as the position of the committee seems to me to be, was unconstitutional for the reason that it will produce revenue, and this clause the committee holds to be constitutional because it produces no revenue and never will produce any. In the interest of conservation and in order that the compensation issue may not be obscured and in order to assist the Government in getting something that it ought to get, I am asking that this clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAINEY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this paragraph (b), which was the subject of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], by striking out the word "to," so that it would read:

Such charges shall be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and be based upon a reasonable compensation equitably apportioned—

And so on.

Mr. ADAMSON. Why not strike out "and to be," and let it just say "based upon"? It will then read:

Such charges shall be fixed from time to time * * * based upon—

That is the best reading. Strike out "and to be." That is the best possible reading.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. If you put a comma after "Engineers."

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not object to the comma.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I am willing to change my amendment, to put a comma after the word "Engineers" and strike out the words "and to be."

Mr. ADAMSON. That makes it better.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, place a comma after the word "Engineers" and strike out the words "and to be."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman. I send to the desk three brief amendments, all relating to paragraph (d), on page 6.

Mr. BRYAN. I have an amendment to paragraph (b). Would the gentleman object to taking that up first and finishing with paragraph (b)?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. All of the section has been read. My amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 22, by striking out the word "just" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "necessary to," and also by striking out the word "to," in the same line, after the word "substantially."

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman insists on splitting the infinitive. I wrote the words in that way to avoid splitting the infinitive.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think that the splitting is being done by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. I think not. "To restore" is in the infinitive, and I object to splitting it.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment I have suggested is adopted, the language will read this way, which seems to me to be much smoother:

(d) For the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable and necessary to substantially restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval.

Mr. ADAMSON. That plays havoc with the grammar. It splits the infinitive, and I object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 23, by striking out the words "as existing" and insert in lieu thereof the words "which exist."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. So that the line will read:

Such stream as to navigability which exist at the time of such approval——

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it is much better to strike out the word "as" and to insert a comma.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. ADAMSON. So that is will read:

Such stream as to navigability, existing at the time of such approval.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to striking out the word "as," after the word "navigability," in line 23, and inserting a comma in lieu thereof?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 25, by striking out the word "would" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "might."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that with the word "would" in there it would mean that the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers could not make the requirements specified in this paragraph unless in their judgment the dam that was going to be put in would actually, by reason of its construction, interfere with navigation. I think they ought to have the power to bring this clause into operation if in their judgment the construction of the dam might interfere with navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am opposed to weakening the language. It is conditional anyhow, and if you are going to change it I prefer to go back to the old formula "might, could, would, or should." If you do not do that, it ought to stand as it is. It is a matter of opinion with the engineers as to whether the change, if made, will injure navigation.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes; but unless he believes it would as a matter of fact injure navigation, unless he is certain enough about it to be able to say that it actually would interfere with navigation, he can not require the security for the payment. It would not weaken it to change it, but inserting the word "might" would strengthen it. The Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War ought to have this power, not only when they believe that the construction of the dam would interfere with navigation, but whenever they think it might interfere with navigation. There may be a case where they could say that the construction of the dam in a certain place might injure navigation, where they do not know that it would, but they believe it might, and in such a case they should be able to exact compensation or insist that the Government be secured. In this case, with the word "would" in there, they practically could not exact compensation or security for compensation unless they were sure enough about it to say that it actually would, in their judgment, interfere with navigation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will confess that when I read section (d) I could not understand what it meant, in the form of the language. It refers to a stipulation exacted by the Secretary of War to require the payment of money to restore conditions of navigation on the river, after the dam is constructed and in operation, to the conditions existing before the dam was constructed. It then says that whenever the Secretary of War shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, they shall obtain payment or security for payment. It is then a question of fact. There is no difference between "might" and "would" as far as that is concerned. It is then a question of fact whether navigation is injured or not. It projects into the future a proposition to be determined on the facts as then existing, and uses language in the subjunctive mood, when it should refer to a question of actually existing facts. I would ask my friend from Illinois or my friend from Georgia if that is not the case?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I do not wish to answer the gentleman if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] does.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the question?

Mr. MANN. This refers to a condition which may exist after the dam is constructed and in operation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. Giving the Secretary of War authority to restore conditions if navigation is then injured by the dam.

Mr. ADAMSON. He does not determine it now, whether it will be or not.

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. ADAMSON. But if after the thing happens navigation would be injured, as afterwards determined, he obtains security to meet it.

Mr. MANN. But when he determines it, he determines the question as to whether navigation is injured or not.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. This is a condition that is going originally to prevail before the dam is built; and, going back to the beginning of the section, it says that as a part of the conditions of such approval it shall provide for the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner, and so on, as they may deem reasonable and necessary substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability existing at the time of such approval.

Whenever the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall determine at the time of the approval——

Mr. MANN. That navigation is injured.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No; that this dam, that has not been built——

Mr. MANN. That has been built.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will give him the exact grammar of the situation. A bond for payment is required at the time of the approval of the specifications.

Mr. MANN. A stipulation is required.

Mr. ADAMSON. And whenever the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers afterwards shall determine—and they determine after the dam is built—I think the word "would" is wrong, and it should be "shall have been."

Mr. MANN. No bond is required, but there is a stipulation.

Mr. ADAMSON. It says for the payment or securing the payment.

Mr. MANN. They may exact a bond, but the stipulation is that the grantee shall pay or secure the payment to the United States of such sum of money as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability after the dam is constructed, if the construction of the dam then injures navigation.

Mr. ADAMSON. The language should be "shall have" injured. When you are talking about the future the grammar of the situation is that in case of a future event, if the condition arises, you use the words "shall have been"—if navigation shall have been injured.

Mr. MANN. The future is indicated in the word "shall"—whenever the Secretary of War shall determine that something then exists. It is perfectly plain.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the question in paragraph (d) is whether or not there shall be placed in the original approval a condition or stipulation for the payment of certain sums to the Government under given circumstances. This question is to arise at the time of the approval of the proposition in the first place. At that time no dam has been built, but the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, in determining whether they shall put a clause in the approval to secure payment, must depend on whether their opinion is that the building of the dam is going to interfere with navigation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the stipulation has to go into every approval?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No; I do not.

Mr. MANN. The word "whenever" refers to a time after the dam is constructed and not whenever the stipulation goes in. The stipulation goes into every approval.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I do not think so. I think that in some cases the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may determine that the construction of these works, this dam and lock that are included in the plans, can not possibly interfere with navigation, in which case there would be no need of the stipulation. Perhaps they might determine that it was going to be of great assistance to navigation, and in that case there would be no necessity of putting the stipulation in.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not the purpose of this provision to serve notice on the grantee when he makes the application to construct a dam that if, after he has the dam constructed, navigation is found to have been interfered with by such construction, then, and in that case, he shall comply with what is laid down in this section?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It does not read that way. If it were so intended, the word "would" is not the correct word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is not the gentleman from Illinois willing to use the words "has been"?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Is this a substitute for my amendment?

Mr. BRYAN. No; I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois agree to modify his amendment to the words "has been"——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I am willing to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so as to use the words "has been." The question is on the modified amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to paragraph (d) while we are on it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out paragraph (d) and insert:

"(d) For the payment to the United States of such charge or charges as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable, and as may be sufficient to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval whenever they shall determine that navigation has been or will be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory and appurtenant works."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how many people read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but if anybody reads this debate, such person can come to only one conclusion, and that is that there are many irregularities in this bill. Gentlemen are having considerable discussion over a matter of tense, but that is not all involved in this particular paragraph. The paragraph (d) in the Adamson bill is as follows:

(d) For the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable and just substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval, whenever the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory works.

Now, what I propose here is for the payment to the United States of such charge or charges as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable, and as may be sufficient to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existed at the time of such approval whenever they shall determine that navigation has been or will be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessories and appurtenant works.

There is nothing definite about this security arrangement. There is nothing following the term or securing the payment that can have any meaning or definiteness as to bond or anything of that kind, and if the engineers when they make the survey conclude that there has been or will be a benefit, then the charge comes, and if they do not, there is no charge. I think the substitute is definite and means something, and that the language in the other section will be subject to interpretation, all kinds of interpretation, and that there never will come anything satisfying from it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any improvement in that, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, which I spoke of a few minutes ago, and which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out paragraph (b), pages 4 and 5, and insert the following:

"(b) For the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits which may accrue to such project from the construction, operation, and maintenance by the United States of headwater improvements on any such stream, including storage reservoirs and forest watersheds or lands acquired or held by the United States, such charges to be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War and be based upon a reasonable compensation apportioned among the grantee and others similarly situated upon the same stream receiving direct benefits by reason of the development, improvement, or preservation of navigation in such streams in which such dam or appurtenant or accessory works may be constructed."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the first proposition involved in this substitute is that instead of a provision for such reasonable charge, there is provision for such reasonable annual charges, which evidently the committee means, I should think, but it is essential to make it definite.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We make it from time to time.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, over on page 5, they refer to such lands as are—owned, located, or reserved by the United States at the headwaters of any navigable stream.

The United States is continually acquiring lands for that purpose, and holding other lands for that purpose, and "owned, located, or reserved" I do not believe is as definite as the words "acquired and held." But that may be considered only a matter of construction.

Down further in the bill, in lines 12 and 13, this charge is to be based on benefits by reason of increase in the flow past "their water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvements." That may not be all of the benefits. The gentleman from Alabama believes that these benefits ought to be apportioned, but in assessing benefits they ought to be able to determine what the total benefits are and not just simply what benefits may accrue from the increase in the flow of water past the dam. But there is a further and important divergence. The original bill reads:

Not to exceed in any one year an amount equal to 5 per cent of the total investment cost—

That means what? Does that mean total investment cost of impounding headwaters or the lands reserved? Suppose we have a large lot of lands that have been obtained from the Indians. We do not know what the investment cost is. There is no reason for making any such restriction as that. The board in fixing it ought to be able to rely, and ought only to be required to rely, on benefits derived as in our laws for assessing benefits, where benefits are apportioned, and the suggestion that it be on the total investment is indefinite. Is it to be based on the land owned or the land acquired, or what is the meaning of it? There is nothing here about bonds, so that this security feature, it seems to me, is not worth anything.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reckon that it is unnecessary to discuss grammar any further with the gentleman. It is supposed that that refers to the last thing mentioned, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in subdivision (d) the bill provides practically for the maintenance of the condition of the river as to navigability as it was at the time when the dam was constructed; and if injury is done to the navigability of the stream after the dam has been constructed, the bill provides that the Secretary of War may assess a reasonable sum, such as is sufficient to restore the navigability of the stream to the condition it was before the dam was constructed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, what is the gentleman's amendment? I do not understand that he has offered any?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This question arose in my mind: Suppose the navigation of the stream at the time the dam was constructed was not very good and not very secure and not very profitable. Is there anything in the bill that gives the Government the right to make a better condition of navigation than there was at the time when the dam was constructed, or does improvement to navigation, by virtue of the construction of the dam, cease? I raise this question seriously, because I have not been able anywhere to find a reservation of power to improve the navigation of the stream and make it better than it was at the time when the dams were constructed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Section 2 provides fully for that, at the bottom of page 2:

To protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or maintaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate in connection therewith, without expense to the United States, a lock or locks—

And so forth.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; that is true; but the gentleman does not answer the question that I raised. I know in my own district on the Ohio River there are places where the navigation is not good. If a dam should be constructed across the river at that place, the bill provides for the maintenance of navigation up to the standard that it now is, but it does not provide for an additional improvement of navigation of the river.

Mr. ADAMSON. Why, the gentleman takes a single case where a lock and dam may not be necessary and where other conditions may be put on them. In cases where a lock and dam is necessary or where there would be really some consideration demanded they will require them to put them in, and the language there is expressly put in that it is to protect the present and future interests of the United States in the stream.

Mr. FOWLER. I know that is true, that a lock is likely to be put in there if they destroy or prevent navigation of a stream, but you still do not rise to the magnitude of answering my question.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. FOWLER. My question is, Do you preserve by this bill anywhere the right of the Government to step in when a dam has been built and make the navigation of the river better than it was at the time when the dam was built?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think, in addition to the payment for the service to the Government and placing it back in its original state—does not the gentleman think that is onerous enough? I do not want this bill made so harsh it will not work.

Mr. FOWLER. But the gentleman does not make any progress by his question or by the answer.

Mr. FERRIS. Why not?

Mr. FOWLER. If it is a necessity to preserve the navigation of a stream, it is evident that the progress of time will demand a progress in the navigability of streams. Now, here is a provision in subsection (d) that only reaches a state of navigation or keeps up a state of navigation equal to that at the time when the dam was constructed, but maybe the navigation was poor at the time of constructing the dam and the Government might want to make it better.

Mr. ADAMSON. May I answer the gentleman further?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman must remember that in places where there is not fall enough to require a lock and dam nobody will find any inducement to put up a water-power plant. He has to have falls or there is no enticement to install a water-power plant at all, and the instance the gentleman mentions is an extreme one not likely to occur.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hear none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, this subparagraph, I understand, is intended to meet just such a case as that where there is not much inducement to put in a dam, because there is not any fall and a lock may not be necessary.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but it may become necessary thereafter to navigate the river more extensively than it was navigated in the past. Now, you provide by subsection (d) for keeping up the standard of navigation which existed at the time when the dam was built.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand the gentleman; but it is a case where there is not much inducement for water power. There may be a very small dam which could be built, and a very small lock. Now, you can not——

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I can not yield to two gentlemen at one time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, you can not expect to have a heavy investment in a thing that has not much prospect of a profit, because the project would not be constructed if it did not offer a profit.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman absolutely tries to throw off——

Mr. ADAMSON. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FOWLER (continuing). And refuses to meet——

Mr. ADAMSON. No.

Mr. FOWLER (continuing). The issue squarely, because I know that conditions will arise in the future, if we continue to transport by water, wherein the Government will want to improve navigation and make it better than it is now and better than when the dam or dams are constructed.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman has no right, and I do not think he means, to say that I am trying to evade anything.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I do not.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am trying to understand and answer the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. But I do mean to say——

Mr. ADAMSON. The Government does not waive any right to do anything which belongs to it in a stream.

Mr. FOWLER. I am trying to get it distinctly——

Mr. ADAMSON. What does the gentleman wish to know?

Mr. FOWLER. The provision with reference to keeping up the state of navigation equal to when the dam was built. Now, in the future suppose the Government should want to make navigation better than it was at the time when the dam was built. The owner of the dam might cite this act and say it was the intent of Congress to keep up navigation to the standard only as it existed at the time the dam was built. Now, I want to preserve the right to make the navigation better than it was at the time when the dam was built if the wants of the people demand it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, now, if I understand the gentleman, the Government does not have to preserve the right to do anything it chooses to improve the navigation of the river. It can not make the grantee stand the expenses of it unless they put it in the contract.

Mr. FOWLER. That may be true, but there is this point in section (d). It might be construed by the owner of the plant or dam that it was the intent of Congress only to keep up the standard of navigation that existed at the time when the dam was constructed, and that no intent was contemplated to raise it to a greater efficiency. But the progress of time may require deeper water or a wider current or some other valuable improvement, and we should conserve the right to the Government without hinder.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think so——

Mr. FOWLER. And the Government has no right to step in with this plan, if it would interfere, to increase the navigability of the stream?

Mr. ADAMSON. In conditions other than those I have described in my answer other sections would control the situation.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I can not understand it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if section 3 on page 4 does not answer the question that he has asked?

Mr FOWLER. I did not think it did. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. I will say to the gentleman that the original consent of the Government, as I understand it, in that subdivision (d), is that he shall restore the navigation facilities to what they were when the consent was given.

Mr. FOWLER. That is exactly the point.

Mr. COOPER. On page 15 it is provided that Congress shall have the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act with relation to any dam whenever Congress determines that the conditions of consent have been violated. If you restore it, you shall leave the navigation as it was before.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted on this question of moving to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] a question, in answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. I want to ask the gentleman if section 2 as amended by the committee the other day does not cure his objection?

Mr. FOWLER. That was by the Sherley amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No. Section 2 was so amended the other day as to provide that whenever in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War it was desirable, the contractor or the lessee, without expense to the United States, might be required to put in a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures.

Now, as originally written it read:

> Which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress then may deem necessary.

That has been amended so that it will read:

> At any time it may be deemed necessary.

So that the bill as it now stands provides that whenever in a future Congress the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers conclude that the interests of navigation require that other locks and other dams and other facilities for navigation should be put in they can be put in without expense to the Government. It occurs to me that that answers the gentleman's criticism entirely. Section (d) simply means that if the structures they have put there, in the opinion of the Government, become a menace to navigation, they can be ordered to remove them and restore the conditions just as they were to start with. We can do that, or we can require them to put in additional locks or dams. I do not think the gentleman's objection or criticism is tenable.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion to strike out the last two words.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, have we not spent enough time now on this section to limit the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed as to that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask if we can not limit debate now? How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want?

Mr. RAINEY. I want only five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much on the other side?

Mr. MANN. Say five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 7, by inserting after line 2 the following:

"No dam erected under this act shall be used as a railroad bridge or wagon road bridge, and no piers shall be built in any river in connection with the construction of any such dam to be afterwards used for bridge purposes; and all bridge piers heretofore constructed in any river in connection with any water-power dam shall be removed within such reasonable time as the Secretary of War may fix for said purpose."

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is to prevent the company itself from using the dam for its own purpose in connection with the bill?

Mr. RAINEY. No, sir; not at all. On the contrary, there is no such objection to this amendment. This is intended to meet a condition that may arise at the building of any dam. In building the dam at Keokuk they so constructed the dam as to permit it to be used as a wagon road or railroad bridge, and they have built in the fore bay two piers to support a movable bridge of some kind that crosses the fore bay. It is a menace to navigation. They stand there in 40 feet of water, imperiling all the boats that come down the stream. The committee has already had the matter under consideration. This does not keep that company or any other company from applying to Congress to build a bridge on their dam, but that company did it without any such permission.

I have here a series of letters, written by steamboat owners on the Mississippi River, complaining of those piers and calling attention to the dangers of them. The boats of one line struck those piers, as its officers say in a letter here to me, seven times during the last season. This does not prevent the company from building a bridge, of course, for its own use.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman can not reserve time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is right about that, of course.

I read from a letter written by the Streckfus Steamboat Line, referring to those piers. This is the principal company navigating on the upper river, and navigates packets all the way to St. Paul:

ST. LOUIS, March 19, 1914.

GEORGE M. HOFFMAN,
Major, Corps of Engineers, Rock Island, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 9th regarding bridge piers in the fore bay at Keokuk.

Beg to explain that we have already gone on record as objecting most seriously to the present location of those piers as dangerous, this position being sustained by the report of every pilot and master of our steamers, as well as by other boats using that lock, and we can see now no way by which we can conscientiously agree to the arrangement proposed by the power company as outlined in your letter.

As before stated, the plan agreed upon (or agreed to under protest), by Capt. John Streckfus in January of last year in Maj. Keller's office was one of expediency only, as Maj. Keller said then that that was all he could get Cooper to do, and "it looked like that or nothing."

Neither the spirit nor the letter of that agreement was carried out by Mr. Cooper, and Maj. Keller wrote us in August that he did not intend to ask Cooper to put in the booms, etc.

Now, our boats struck those piers seven times last season, which is proof of our contention that they are dangerous.

The water there is 40 feet deep, and an accident could cause a great loss of life as well as property, and we certainly feel that those piers (at least the first two west of the center span) should be removed and the span on both sides then be protected by booms.

We wish to impress the fact that only two boat owners were consulted by Maj. Keller when the so-called agreement was made after a large number of pilots, masters, and owners had insisted upon a 300-foot opening in a straight line only the day previous at a hearing in Maj. Keller's office), and one of these owners, Capt. Blair, operates two small boats in that district, either one of which can go through the 175-foot draw broadside without striking.

While two of our steamers are over 75-foot beam and three of them over 250 feet in length, one of them 235 feet, and for this reason especially we feel that our protest should carry weight at this time after we have proved by one season's operation the danger of the arrangement and the error of the claim on the part of Mr. Cooper and Maj. Keller that it was safe.

In addition to this, the power company absolutely disclaims any liability whatever for damages or delays resulting from any cause incident to the construction at Keokuk and has refused payment of claims filed with them by this company.

Under these circumstances we do not feel that in justice to ourselves and the interests of river navigation in that section that boat property should in this way be exposed to risk and lives of passengers endangered by allowing those piers to remain in the middle of the navigable channel, pending the legalizing of them by congressional action.

Our understanding of the thing is that they are there contrary to law; and if this is so, we feel that boat property which must use that portion of the river should receive first consideration as to safety.

The Government booms referred to will unquestionably be urgently needed below the locks this season (as requested last year) to prevent other accidents similar to the one in which our steamer Dubuque tore a 20-foot hole in her hull by striking a drill boat after booms had been requested.

Those booms were never placed below the lock last season, but should by all means be put there now.

Should the old booms be used above the lock, new ones should be placed below.

In view of your having already recommended approval of the plan to leave the piers as they are, with certain booms added, we are to-day protesting to the Secretary of War and others at Washington against the adoption of the plan, and are urging the objections as stated in this letter.

We are sorry, indeed, to not be able to meet the power company's proposal in this instance, but we know the situation to be dangerous, and the proposed plan betters the present condition but little.

Our objections are not based upon theory at all, but upon the experience and reports of a dozen of the very best pilots in the profession, plus the repair bills for damages already sustained there by our boats.

Yours, very respectfully,

STRECKFUS STEAMBOAT LINE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question?

Mr. RAINEY. With pleasure.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman does not think that under the terms of this bill or any existing law such a bridge could be built on a dam without express authority of Congress, does he?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not think so, but my amendment limits the right of the Secretary of War to permit it to be done. He can not permit it except by the authority of Congress. If this is added here to the provisions which regulate the building of dams, then in the future the Secretary of War can not permit this to be done. It can not then be done without the permission of Congress. The Secretary of War has done it without the permission of Congress, but afterwards the company expects to come here and ask permission to complete their bridge, and this will probably occur in connection with any bridge that may be built.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I did not catch from the reading exactly what the amendment provided. Is the gentleman sure that unless there is an expression in that amendment that it does not prevent the company from getting that permission, under the language the company would not be permitted to do that? Is it not so general, in other words, that it would prevent the company building a dam from even getting the permission? I suggest that possibly——

Mr. RAINEY. I do not so understand it. If my friend will call my attention to anything that will make it any clearer, I shall be glad to make it clearer.

Mr. BURNETT. I did not catch it distinctly.

Mr. RAINEY. I am trying to prevent the Secretary of War from authorizing this to be done unless the company first gets the consent of Congress. There is no dispute about the facts.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois says there is no dispute. I want to say that not one single statement that the gentleman made is correct. There is not one.

Mr. RAINEY. I got my view of the facts from the chairman of the committee. If I am mistaken, I must have misunderstood him.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have my views about allowing one company, one corporation, to put a bridge on top of a dam constructed by another corporation, but I do not see any use in putting an amendment in this bill to take care of it. In other words, I think we shall be able to take care of the trouble at Keokuk without the gentleman putting an amendment in this bill.

Mr. RAINEY. And the committee will try to do hereafter what I am trying to do now, to prevent the company from doing this very thing?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am trying, so far as I am concerned, to take care of the situation, and I am not going to vote for another corporation to put a bridge on top of that dam.

Mr. RAINEY. Nor am I going to vote for another corporation to be allowed to put a bridge on top of that dam. It ought not to be permitted to do it without the permission of Congress. That is the only thing I want to research.

Mr. ADAMSON. The matter is before our committee, and we are at work on it as well as we know how, and we will work it out all right. If the gentleman will only restrain his impetuosity I think we shall work it out all right.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman should restrain the impetuosity of the War Department in this regard.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think they will work it out.

Mr. RAINEY. They do not seem to be able to.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman says he is familiar with my attitude. I just wanted to say what my attitude was.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 7, by inserting after line 2 the following: "No dam erected under this act shall be used as a railroad bridge or a wagon-road bridge, and no piers shall be built in any river in connection with the construction of any such dam to be afterwards used for bridge purposes; and all bridge piers heretofore constructed in any river in connection with any water-power dam shall be removed within such reasonable time as the Secretary of War may fix for said purpose."

Mr. RAINEY. After the words providing for the bridge I ask unanimous consent to amend it by inserting the words "unless the consent of Congress shall be had therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] control the time?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand the gentleman from Minnesota has five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I made the statement that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was in error about the facts. Our subcommittee went to Keokuk last winter. I found that I sympathized with the position of the gentleman from Illinois. The district which I have the honor to represent is vitally interested in the navigation of the Mississippi River, and some of our people have complained about the very thing which was described by the gentleman from Illinois. So I went there determined to find out exactly what the facts are and to do the best I could to promote and protect navigation. While we were there we met the representatives of all the steamboat lines and talked over with them what ought to be done. They told us that if the pier should be protected by booms they would be satisfied. They told us so at that time there.

Now, the pier has never been used as a public bridge or for a public bridge. It has always been used as a part of the plant for the construction of the dam. In order to get its men and its material back and forth from the Iowa shore to the dam under construction a pier was placed in the fore bay, and a temporary bridge was constructed from the Iowa shore to the main part of the dam and the power house, and upon that pier a temporary bridge was constructed. I understand that temporary bridge has been torn down. It never has been used as a highway bridge for the public, and it never has been used as a railway bridge or for any such purpose except work trains, and it has never been used by the public or anybody else or for anything else except for the construction of the dam.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that the piers are still there, and that before the gentleman's committee there is pending a bill asking permission to use them?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. The gentleman is correct. What is known as the Interstate Bridge Co., whatever it may be, composed of the citizens of Keokuk, did ask us to authorize that dam to be used as a bridge. The bill has been pending before our committee and has not been acted upon. There is a bridge below which it is contended satisfies the demands of the situation, so the bill has not been acted upon. What the future may bring forth no one can foretell, but I can assure this committee that nothing will be permitted which will obstruct navigation. That will be our primary purpose.

The gentleman made the statement the other day that the Government was forced to protect the pier by booms at its own expense. I think that was incorrect. Representatives of the bridge company told us they would do it for themselves. So I requested the other day the Chief of Engineers to forward to me a statement as to the situation, and I will read it. He forwarded the following:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 27, 1914.

Hon. F. C. STEVENS,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your oral request, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a telegram just received from Maj. Hoffman, the district engineer officer at Rock Island, Ill., relative to installation of booms in fore bay of lock at Keokuk, Iowa.

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Then I will read this telegram:

ROCK ISLAND, ILL., July 25, 1914.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C.:

Booms have been installed in fore bay Keokuk power plant as per my indorsement department letter of March 2, 35003, and map therewith, apparently perfectly satisfactory to steamboat line; no complaints received. Booms are old ones, belonging to Government; were borrowed, repaired at considerable cost, and installed by power company without any expense to United States.

HOFFMAN, Engineer.

I judge from this that the fact is that part of the old booms that belonged to the United States were installed and were taken over and fixed up by the power company, so that the gentleman from Illinois is correct to that extent; and to that I wish to change my statement that the old Government boom was installed by saying that it was fixed up at the expense of the power company, and has since been installed at the expense of the power company, and is now there at their expense.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. MANN. I understood my colleague to state the other day—and I am quite sure that he did—that this installing of booms was to be done at the expense of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; he made that statement, and I am here showing what the exact facts are by the official report, and that is what the House wants to know.

Mr. RAINEY. I suppose that the main cost is the cost of booming. Merely tying to the piers does not amount to anything. The gentleman says he does not know of any complaints. I have a number of letters complaining as to the width of the span and saying that it ought to be 300 feet.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have had no complaints, and evidently the engineers have not had any.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY) there were—ayes 5, noes 14.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with any such dam, whether at the expense of such grantee or of the United States, shall at all times be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by any such dam, as shall be made by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, and in the use and operation of such navigation facilities the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the uses of such dam by such grantee for power purposes. Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers and such fishways as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, and for failure to comply with any such rule or regulation such grantee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not less than $500 for each month's default, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed or provided by law.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see if we can agree on time for debate on this question.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think we had better have the amendment read first.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are several amendments to be offered. I do not want to count the time used in reading the amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. May I inquire what the gentleman's amendment is?

Mr. ANDERSON. Let it be read.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto conclude in 20 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that request until this amendment is read.

Mr. ADAMSON. I withdraw the request at the suggestion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 5, by inserting after the word "that," in line 3, on page 7, the following: "the right is hereby reserved to the United States to construct, maintain, and operate, in connection with any dam built in accordance with the provisions of this act, a suitable lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structures for navigation purposes and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the necessity for this amendment? We already have it in the law.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should be glad to have the gentleman point out where it is in the law.

Mr. MANN. It is in the existing law, but not in this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is in the existing law, but not in this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I had an idea that it was in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; if the gentleman will remember, the other day we adopted an amendment which reserved to the Government the right to require the grantee to construct locks, booms, sluices, and so forth, at its expense, but we did not reserve to the Government itself the right to construct a lock, boom, sluice, or anything of that kind in connection with the dam of the grantee, and the only purpose of this amendment is to restore the existing law, reserving to the Government the right itself to construct a lock at its own expense in connection with the dam of the grantee. It is conceivable that conditions might arise under which it would not be proper or fair to require the grantee to build a lock, sluice, or boom at its expense, and the purpose of this amendment is to permit the Government to build it under such conditions.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will look on page 3——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Pages 2 and 3.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think he will find it all adequately expressed. We prescribe that the Government may require it done by the grantee, because, beginning at line 7, page 3, we provide that—

Whenever Congress shall deem such facilities necessary, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches.

Mr. ANDERSON. But that merely has reference to the banks, and the title to the land for such purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that.

Mr. ANDERSON. It does not reserve to the Government the right to construct the dam.

Mr. ADAMSON. You do not need authority for the Government to construct a dam whenever it wants to.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is so; but where you have granted to the grantee the right to build a dam the Government can not go in afterwards and build a lock itself in connection with such a dam unless it reserves the right to do so.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. ANDERSON was again read.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it is necessary at all, but I see no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In section 2 there is a provision in regard to the construction of locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures, and so forth. Then following that is a provision that the persons owning such dams shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches. Now, if the Government acquires the title to the land for the construction of a lock, why do we have to ask permission of the grantee that we may construct the lock?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let me ask one further question. In section 2 it is provided—

That as a part of such approval such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or maintaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate in connection therewith, without expense to the United States, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress then may deem necessary in the interests of navigation.

Now, that, attached to the statement that the gentleman has just read, gives all the authority that is necessary, does it not?

Mr. MANN. We thought it did when we drew the original act.

Mr. ANDERSON. But you put the reservation in the original act.

Mr. MANN. It is put in here, but in a different place; that is all.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It ought to be there.

Mr. MANN. If we give the right to the grantee to build a dam and say that if we construct a lock the grantee shall furnish us with the title to the land that we think necessary for the construction of the lock, and we get the title to the land, why do we have to ask the grantee for license to build the lock?

Mr. ANDERSON. We might have to tear up half of his dam.

Mr. MANN. That is left to the Secretary of War. If we get the title to the land, it does not require the consent of anybody else.

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me that it does require the consent of the grantee. If you are going to destroy his property, you have to reserve the right to do it, and if you intend to change his property you must reserve that right. That is all my amendment does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 19, after the word "shall," strike out the following: be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not less than" and insert the following: "pay damages for the breach thereof, and in addition thereto a penalty of."

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a bad mixture of criminal and civil law, and I am against it.

Mr. DILLON. If this amendment is adopted, it will eliminate from the section the criminal penalty and fix in lieu thereof a penalty for the violation of the contract. If I understand the purport of this bill, it makes a grant on certain conditions of certain privileges. It is a grant of a franchise, and a franchise is a contract. I see no necessity of trying to make a criminal act when the elements of a crime do not exist.

I would like for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] to point out where there is any act of criminality in this bill. It does not say that it must be intentionally done; it does not say that it must be maliciously done; it does not say that it must be a malicious destruction of property. There is not a single criminal act specified, and yet it says that a man is guilty of a criminal offense simply because he is unable to carry into effect a contract. It might just as well be said that a man who executes a promissory note is guilty of a misdemeanor when he fails to pay it. The mixture of criminal and civil law is in the bill, and there is no necessity of trying to make an act a crime when it is not a crime. Congress, or any legislative body, has not the right to say that an act is criminal when it is not an offense against the public.

Again, the Government has reserved its right in various ways. It has the right of mandamus, the right of injunction; it can go into court and exercise the right at any time it may choose to do so by these remedies. I want to say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, he can not convict anybody simply because he is unable to comply with his contract.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. In a moment. For instance, suppose a party became insolvent, would you say he was a criminal because he could not comply with his contract? These are contractual relations, and it is not a criminal act.

Mr. ADAMSON. Upon what language does the gentleman base his opinion or construction making this a contract?

Mr. MANN. It refers to the lights, other signals, and fishways, and so forth.

Mr. DILLON. These are elements in the specifications and plans.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken as to its being a contract.

Mr. DILLON. This simply specifies the plans that may be promulgated and become a part of the contract.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose this was enacted into law to-day without this provision in it—does the gentleman doubt our authority to put it in a separate act to-morrow, requiring them to furnish lights, fishways, and so forth, under penalty for violation?

Mr. DILLON. You should go further than you do in this connection and put some act of criminality into it, because this is contractual; it does not belong to the Criminal Code.

Mr. ADAMSON. This section does not mention a contract at all.

Mr. DILLON. This is a contract. A grant is a contract.

Mr. ADAMSON. This section is an independent proposition that requires rules and regulations to be made by the War Department and makes it a crime if they are violated by the owner of the dam. There is no contract about it or in it.

Mr. DILLON. If the gentleman will allow me to make a further suggestion, this is a grant on the part of the Government. Now, the grantee is unknown. It is a float, so to speak; but when the grantee is found and comes up and says, "I will comply with these conditions," then he becomes the grantee.

Mr. ADAMSON. He does not have to say so under this section.

Mr. DILLON. Then you have the grantor and the grantee, and you have a contract without any element of criminality in it.

Mr. ADAMSON. We make laws to cover unborn generations. They do not agree to comply with them; but if they do not, they are punished.

Mr. DILLON. This is a contractual relation, but it is not a contractual relation until the other party is found who will take up the grantee part of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. This does not depend on contractual relations; it says that when they do not such things as the Secretary of War shall require they shall be convicted.

Mr. DILLON. The Supreme Court of the United States decided in the Dartmouth College case many years ago that a franchise or grant of privilege is a contract.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my friend from South Dakota is entirely mistaken.

Mr. COOPER. The "grantee" is in the bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no grantee in this bill.

Mr. DILLON. There will be. Let me ask the gentleman when the party who accepts these conditions comes in, then have you not your grantee?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly. This is not a contract. This is a provision authorizing the provisions under which a contract may be entered into hereafter. First, it may be an act of Congress giving authority to construct a dam, or the authority may be obtained from the Secretary of War without an act of Congress in certain cases, and this fixes the terms of the contract when it is entered into; but this section has nothing to do with the contract. This section is a regulation of commerce, and on all or any of the navigable streams wherever an obstruction has been or is hereafter placed we have the right to require lights and signals. We have the right to require fishways. We do not get that under a contractual relation at all. We get that under the power to regulate commerce.

While I was helping to bring such bills out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, we passed a provision requiring everybody who now or heretofore had a bridge or other obstruction over or in navigable waters to furnish such lights as should be authorized by the Lighthouse Bureau and under penalty of the law. If we shou'd pass this law to-day, and grant a permit to some one to-morrow, and he should build a dam the next day, then the next day after that we could pass this criminal provision of the law as a new law requiring lights. We want a criminal provision of the law to make people put lights and signals up. Suppose there is a great dam or a great bridge and a steamboat runs into it for lack of a light. It is very little satisfaction to say that you can sue the company. You want to be able to convict for a criminal offense.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, when I said the word "grantee" was used in the bill, I was looking straight at the bill, and I find the word "grantee" in line 14 and also in line 19.

Mr. MANN. I did not doubt that the word "grantee" was in the bill. I knew that it was.

Mr. COOPER. If the gent'eman did not doubt it, he has a queer way of expressing his acquiescence in my views. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I did not say the word "grantee" was not in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. Because he absolutely contradicted me. He said the word "grantee" was not in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I made no such statement.

Mr. COOPER. Then I can simply shake my hand and look up and say, "I appeal to the RECORD."

Mr. MANN. Well, appeal to the RECORD. I shall not change it.

Mr. COOPER. Of course, the gentleman did not mean to say it, but he said it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. He said it all right.

Mr. COOPER. I have the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi, and with him I am a clear majority on this proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this provides that the grantee shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. I have not studied this very closely, but could not the grantee in this case be a corporation, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there is any doubt about that. It could be fined.

Mr. COOPER. But the gentleman from Illinois said it would not amount to very much to collect the money, but that "we propose to imprison." How are you going to imprison a corporation?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, I suggest also that the remedy suggested by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] exists anyway by law. If anybody is damaged by violation of this law, a suit can be brought.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but I did not understand the force of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the mere collection of money would not amount to anything where a steamboat, because of the absence of a light, collided with an obstruction in a river. He said we wanted something more than the collection of money.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understood him to mean a suit for damages would not be a suffic'ent satisfaction.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything about "imprisonment." I do not change my remarks as they are made to the reporter. I did not say the word "grantee" was not in this bill, and I do not change my remarks, notwithstanding my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. I said there was no grantee in this bill. I repeat it for the benefit of the two gentlemen. If they can find a grantee in this bill, I will take it back.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, what I said was that this was the language of the bill. I did not say there was not any grantee. I said that was the language of the bill. The gentleman disputed that statement.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let us have peace.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. He says there is no grantee in this bill. Will there not be a grantee when one is found to comply with the conditions?

Mr. MANN. There will be a grantee, undoubtedly, regulated by the provisions of the bill. There can be no dispute about that.

Mr. DILLON. He becomes a grantee when he complies with the conditions of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly he becomes a grantee.

Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman think a man should be declared to be a criminal when he is without notice of what the Secretary of War may promulgate in reference to rules and regulations?

Mr. MANN. I do not think he could be without any notice.

Mr. DILLON. But you are making him a criminal without giving him notice.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all. He will not have any notice of this bill, except the theoretical notice of the law, but it is his business to know what signals are required to protect navigation from the obstructions that he puts in the river, and if he does not learn them he takes his chance of punishment for it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments end in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ADAMSON. We have had over half an hour of debate on this section.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I have not had half a minute.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to a situation which seems to me to exist in both this section and the following section.

Mr. MANN. Had we not better dispose of this amendment? Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. No; there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moved to strike out the last word of the amendment, and that gave him the floor for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to dispose of the amendments one at a time as we get to them.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman wants to dispose of the amendment, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my motion; but I do not want to be cut off.

Mr. MANN. That will not cut the gentleman off.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, can we get an agreement on this section and amendments?

Mr. ANDERSON. I shall want but a few minutes. I merely want to call the attention of the committee to a situation which exists in both this section and section 7.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto end in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising is to call the attention of the chairman and other members of the committee to a situation which arises both under this section and section 7. In the subsequent section the committee has changed the language of the existing law which provides that "any person who shall fail to comply with the lawful order of the Secretary of War" to "any grantee who shall fail or refuse to comply." Now, both section 5 and section 7 are penal sections, and they only apply to the persons who are specifically designated in them. What I want to direct the attention of the committee to is this: Under either of those sections would it be possible to convict an assignee of a grantee under this act? He is not mentioned, the bill does not apply to him. The section is penal, and it would only apply to persons specifically denominated by the section itself; and it seems to me that the word "grantee" in both of these sections to conform with the general policy of the law ought to be changed to "person." The bill itself defines persons so that it applies to both singular and plural and includes incorporations, companies, and associations.

Mr. ADAMSON. Has the gentleman noticed the language at the top of page 10, which reads—whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original owner hereunder.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, that may be applicable, so far as contractural relations are concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. It says "the provisions of this bill."

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to know whether it is applicable to the penal provisions of the act. I confess I am somewhat in doubt about the proposition myself, and I merely wanted to direct the attention of the committee to it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "purposes," in line 13, of page 7, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add: "the storage of water back of any such dam shall not be permitted to be accomplished in such a way as to interfere with the natural flow of the waters of the stream in which such dam is located, but at all hours of the day and night there shall be permitted to pass through or over such dam the ordinary natural flow of said stream: Provided, That the interests of navigation require the entire ordinary flow of said stream in the day and in the night."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. The agreement included 10 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, does not interfere with the storage of water in rivers where storage may be accomplished without interfering with navigation. This amendment is offered to reach a condition in the Mississippi River and perhaps in other rivers. At Keokuk the company there has been permitted by an order of the War Department to store water at night and to materially stop the flow of the Mississippi River. They did it last year and they are doing it this year, in order to enable the company to have more water to use in the daytime. This is desirable, of course, considered from the standpoint of generating as much power as the river will produce, but it has at that point a disastrous effect upon navigation. I want to read what some officers of steamboats and some steamboat companies navigating this river have to say about this storage of water. Frequently vessels navigating below the dam have great difficulty in reaching the dam, especially in the nighttime. I read from the Waterways Journal, referring to an article in the Keokuk Gate City. The Waterways Journal says:

If the Keokuk Gate City had had a representative with us to go to bed on the steamer Keokuk on the morning of September 12, 1913, at 3 a. m., he would have found the boat afloat. On arising at 6 a. m. the boat was hard aground, as was the Streckfuss Line steamer Dubuque. That morning we saw launches out on the river at 3 a. m., and at 6.30 a. m. they were high and dry. The writer, manager of the Waterways Journal, will make this affidavit. We will also swear that the stage of water at Alton, Ill., is also affected by the storage of water by the power company at night.

Again, I want to read from a letter written by the traffic manager of the Streckfuss Steamboat Line to me, of recent date:

The increase and reduction of the flow having caused unusual raising and lowering of the water level, which at the same time affected the current in the river in such way as to give an unusual speed to the flow during some hours of the day and to produce practically a slack-water channel during other hours.

Our boats have frequently been delayed by reason of this variation in the channel, some of them having been left aground at their landings through sudden fall in the water level.

In one instance it was necessary to hold one of our big St. Paul steamers five hours at the lock until enough water could be allowed to pass the dam as to raise the channel below the dam some 18 inches.

The principal actual delays were brought about by the shoal conditions at certain times of the day, when the minimum quantity of water was allowed to pass through the dam.

As to complaints regarding the method of operating the dam, would explain that these complaints have borne upon the channel conditions produced by the operation of the dam, but not upon anything pertaining to the dam itself.

We discontinued our St. Paul service about two weeks earlier than anticipated this season, due to the uncertainty of getting through the Keokuk district without injury or delay to steamers, and because of these delays having come about with considerable frequency during the month of August, we deemed it unwise to attempt to handle any material freight business, as the increase draft of vessels so laden seem to assure further delays and possibly injury in the Keokuk vicinity.

We know of no additional boats under construction or contemplation for use on the upper river through any affect the completion of the dam may have had upon navigation.

The dam has benefited navigation for a distance of only about 40 miles. Above this it has had absolutely no affect upon the channel.

This company operates five boats in the district between St. Louis and St. Paul, and we have not been able this season to find any indication of benefit by reason of increase to our business in which the Keokuk Dam or power plant could have possibly contributed anything by way of betterment.

The completion of the dam will have no effect upon navigation on the river as regards either the volume or the rates for the reason, as we already stated, it has so far influenced the river above by way of betterment for a distance of 40 miles, and during the past season it has unquestionably proved a serious interference with navigation for approximately a like distance below Keokuk.

The fact of difficulty or interference with navigation at any point between St. Louis and St. Paul interferes with the traffic over the entire area, for the reason that in this section of the country business originates below Keokuk and is destined for points above Keokuk, or vice versa, and if a steamer has difficulty in getting through the channel to Keokuk, the result is the same as though the river were in that condition for its entire length.

Your letter does not touch upon the other difficulty at Keokuk, which gives indication of being one of the most unfavorable and undesirable conditions bearing upon navigation at Keokuk.

By this we refer to the bridge piers which have been placed across the channel in the fore bay, between the power house and the Iowa shore at Keokuk.

These piers are most unfortunately arranged and have been in position all this season, practically without protection work, and have seriously endangered steamers a number of times this season through their unfortunate location, mainly and partly through the absence of protection work.

Our steamers have struck these piers seven times, and in each instance narrowly escaped a most serious accident.

We seem this season to have been unable to make these conditions clear to the proper authorities or to the power company.

This, notwithstanding the fact that we strenuously objected to the arrangement before navigation opened and subsequent experience during the season, seems to have borne out our contentions perfectly.

I read again from a letter written by A. V. Fetter, who operates a boat on the Mississippi River, as follows:

In our opinion navigation of the river has not been improved. We do not know of any vessels having to wait for a rise of water before being able to make the locks. Navigation above the dam has been improved, but below the dam it is more difficult because of the various stages of water each day.

I read from a letter of recent date written by Bert Edwards, a river pilot:

I think that holding the water back at night this summer caused the river between St. Louis and Keokuk to be in bad shape, because the rising and falling caused the channel to fill up; a fall of any length causes the channel to cut out, but as soon as a rise comes the channel stops cutting and fills up.

Always before in low water the channel was very close, but good except in a few wide places. This summer there was no good channel below Keokuk except in a few places where the water has always been deep.

There is no question in my mind but what the addition of more turbines and the holding back of more water will not only interfere with but stop all navigation of boats of any size between Keokuk and St. Louis when there is less than 2 feet on the gauges.

I think that the holding back of the water affected the channel down to the mouth of the Illinois River. I am going by my experience in former seasons, when the river was as low and lower than this season. I mean the reading of bridge gauges, not by condition of channel, as the channel was very bad this summer with the gauges showing more water.

I can not say that I noticed any sudden change in the stage of water. But our time always got us through the lock before dark, and the first night out of St. Louis we were too far below to have the sudden change affect the channel, as I am told it did above.

The difficulties of navigation this summer were caused by the channel being very bad; or, in other words, it did not cut out when the water fell as in former seasons.

The bridge piers above the lock should be placed so that the dam span would be in line with the lock.

As the bridge piers are now, also the opening in the ice breaker, makes it very bad with a big boat or a tow. You have to come in headed for the power house and then turn to the right to get into the lock, and if the wind is blowing off the Iowa shore it is almost impossible to keep from striking the power-house wall. The only protection I have seen on the bridge piers this summer was put there to protect the piers, not the steamboats, as they offered no protection to boats.

Yours, respectfully,

BERT EDWARDS,
Pilot Steamer "St. Paul."

I read an extract from a letter of the Interstate Material Co.—a letter written by Capt. Dipple, of that company—a company which operates boats on the Mississippi River:

Boats had no difficulty in navigating before this improvement was brought about by the dam, but they will not be able to navigate below the dam if the water is held back at night during low-water period.

We appreciate your effort in protecting the river and will be glad to furnish you any information that may help you.

Again, I read from a letter of Harry F. Lancaster, pilot of the steamer Dubuque, written to me:

ST. LOUIS, October 10, 1913.

GENTLEMEN: The question has been brought before me as to the effect the power dam at Keokuk, Iowa, has on the river below Keokuk.

I can say that the water at Keokuk, Iowa, has a fall of 18 or 20 inches during the time the power company holds the water back at night. I know this to be a fact, as I have seen it; and was pilot on the steamer Dubuque this season for five months; and this steamer made three landings a week at Keokuk; and in the morning the steamer Dubuque had to back for some time to free herself from being aground at that landing. This has delayed steamer each time.

At times we have landed or tried to land so that we could place the steamer gangplank on the runway; but this was impossible to do, because of the water having lowered so as to cause the gangplank to come 5 or 6 feet short of reaching the water's edge.

About the power company's bridge above the lock:

This bridge, I can say, is one of the worst obstructions to steamboats I ever saw on the Mississippi River, and if this bridge opening is not straightened or taken out it will cause some great disaster, loss of life or boat.

This bridge is hard to run at any time, wind or no wind, as these large boats flank a great deal in that deep and dead water.

If this bridge was in line with the lock and the opening at the ice breaker it would be safe for steamboats to run.

Steamer Dubuque damaged her starboard guard on one of these piers while she was trying to back through, and I know that it was not the fault of the pilot. I myself was the pilot on duty, and I took every precaution I could, but the wind caught me and blew me on to the Iowa side pier, and the captain and the owners of the Dubuque will state this as the fact.

Yours, truly,

HARRY E. LANCASTER,
Pilot Steamer "Dubuque."

I read from a letter written by C. H. Magee, captain of the steamer Quincy, operating on this part of the river:

STRECKFUS STEAMBOAT LINE, St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 11th received, and in regard to steamer Quincy being delayed at the entrance to the lock, will say that we tried three times to enter the lock, but couldn't get over, as we hit the rocks that were blasted out. We also sounded and couldn't find more than 3 feet.

We then tied up and got Maj. Meigs out and he had the power company open up the wickets and raised the water 18 inches, and we got over all right.

Yours, truly,

C. MCGEE,
Captain Steamer "Quincy."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell of the date of that statement?

Mr. RAINEY. That was dated in October last.

Mr. ADAMSON. Have not satisfactory regulations been adopted and acquiesced in since that?

Mr. RAINEY. I did not understand it so.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my impression.

Mr. RAINEY. I understand the storing of the water still goes on.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am talking about the use and regulation of the dam so as to provide for the flow of water below.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not understand that there have been any changes. At any rate, if there have been, there can not be any objection to this amendment, because it seeks to reach only such storage of water as affects navigation and is advisory in its character, in order to produce some better regulations hereafter, if water is to be stored at night, than there has been heretofore.

Now, I have a number of letters from companies operating on the river, as to the varying tides in the river below the dam caused by storing the water there in the nighttime, in order to enable this company to produce 104,000 horsepower, which is all they can produce even if permitted to store the way they have been permitted to store heretofore. That sort of storage, if it interferes with navigation, ought not to be permitted, and if this is a bill to promote navigation, as the committee insists it is, then, in connection with the statement in this bill which comes just ahead of this amendment, to the effect that the interests of navigation shall be paramount, there can be no objection to an amendment of this character.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment goes to the root of the difficulty which always has existed and always must exist in the use of dams for water power, and navigation also, in navigable streams, and if such an amendment be adopted of course it would completely end the construction of any more dams in any navigable streams in this country and destroy those which now are so used.

The situation is this: I have had several years of experience in such a controversy, as I narrated to the committee the other day, upon the St. Croix River, between Minnesota and Wisconsin, of which the western part is in my district. Every dam which is constructed in a navigable stream where navigation exists necessarily impedes the navigation somewhat. Both navigation and power want all the water. Both of them can not have all the water. There must be, in order that both shall exist—and both ought to exist in the proper use of a stream—a proper division. If only one shall exist, a very large part of the water resources of that section are wasted, so that it is the business of the Government, in order to utilize to the utmost the water resources of that region, to take hold and regulate how that water ought to be used for the best advantage of the people and encourage all interests properly in the best use of the water which is for the public use.

Now, in the St. Croix River we had the same trouble years ago; both navigation and the power interests wanted to be first considered. After various hearings the War Department adopted a set of rules and regulations which have worked fairly well ever since, navigation being given the preference in the use of the water. The same condition will necessarily exist at Keokuk. Of course, the steamboat owners wish to use that water and go as they please all the time. Naturally, I do not blame them at all. The power interest wishes to use that water all the time. Neither of them can do so. If the gentleman's amendment passes, that will eliminate the Keokuk Dam as a power proposition. If the Keokuk Dam people would have their way, it almost would wipe out the steamboats unless we shall be careful. Neither of them ought to have their own way. Both of them should exist and flourish. It is the business of the Government to decide what ought to be done and cause them all to be good and all to prosper, and our committee had that very situation in mind in framing the present law, where it provides:

And in the use and operation of such navigation facilities the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the uses of such dams by such grantee for power purposes.

In other words, we provide that in the disposition of the water the War Department shall give first consideration to the interests of navigation. Now, we had this same complaint last winter when the committee went to Keokuk, and we found the same condition had existed, and we found undoubtedly that the power company was to blame in doing or allowing that to be done. We jumped on them just as hard as we knew how, and we told them that that condition ought to stop and must stop and that navigation ought to be cared for, and the engineer was informed and the power company was informed and the steamboat people were informed of the rules by which they can have the right to have power at such times as may be deemed reasonable by the Chief of Engineers. We were informed that the situation last fall, of which the gentleman from Illinois complains, was due in large part to the experiments in the use of water with a new dam, to the closing or adjusting parts of the works, which was necessary then, and would not occur again. We examined the situation and believed it to be true and that such difficulties will not occur again to the detriment of navigation.

But if the law places a hard-and-fast rule on the use of water, of course that disposes of the use of the water for power, and but little power could be generated; so the value of the plant for that purpose would be destroyed. The result is, we believe, that this amendment placed by the committee in the bill would notify the engineers that that water must be conserved, that it must be utilized to the greatest advantage for both navigation and power, and that navigation should be paramount. But if we attempt to make a hard-and-fast rule that the natural flow for navigation must be maintained all the time, that completely destroys all power.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not think the gentleman understood the amendment as read.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I listened to it carefully.

Mr. RAINEY. It seeks to accomplish exactly what the gentleman wishes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But I will say to the gentleman that the Keokuk Dam is not the only dam in the United States. Remember that this bill covers all the dams. The War Department and the Chief of Engineers, with their officers and civil engineers of ability and experience on the ground, who have had experience in that kind of work—and they have it all over the United States under all sorts of conditions—can adopt rules and regulations to preserve this water to the best advantage of the people better than can be done by an arbitrary rule laid down by the House.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. Does not the law now authorize the Secretary of War to determine and regulate the level of the boom?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes: that was provided in the first water-power bill that was passed, and we continue it in this bill. But now we lay down the rule as to preference. I believe the preference ought to be given to commerce; and, fitting in with this situation all over the United States, I think it would accomplish just exactly what my friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] desires to accomplish, and yet give some benefit to the power resources.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 7, by striking out the word "such" after the word "any," in line 5 of said page, and by inserting, after the word "dam," in said line, the following: "built under the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto has closed.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I beg pardon. I have five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is five minutes' time left.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], on line 3 it seems to me this amendment should be made. Unless this amendment be made in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota and adopted, the section would read this way:

That the right is hereby reserved to the United States to construct, maintain, and operate in connection with any dam built in accordance with the provisions of this act a suitable lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structures for navigation purposes and the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with such dam.

In other words, the word "such" would seem to limit what follows to such dams as the Government might put a lock in.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for an interruption?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think that the insertion of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota changes the preceding sense or the object to which the word "such" refers?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. With the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, the word "such" confines what follows to the dam that the Government might put a lock in.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let me hear the gentleman read it as he has amended it.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I read:

That the right is hereby reserved to the United States to construct, maintain, and operate in connection with any dam built in accordance with the provisions of this act a suitable lock or locks, sluices, booms, or other structures for navigation purposes and the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with such dam.

And so on.

Mr. ADAMSON. What do you put in there?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I strike out the word "such" and put in the words "built under the provisions of this act" after the word "dam."

Mr. ADAMSON. If you do not strike out the word "such," it still will not refer to anything except "under the provisions of this act." Does not the word "such" mean the same thing?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No, sir; it does not. The word "such," with the amendment inserted in line 3 by the gentleman from Minnesota, would seem to relate to the language in lines 3, 4, and 5—to such dams as the Government would build a lock in.

Mr. ADAMSON. You have added in there "in connection with the construction," and so forth.

Mr. MANN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota says "any dam built in accordance with the provisions of this act." That is the dam referred to. That is "such" dam.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I do not think so. If I did, I would not offer my amendment, certainly.

Mr. MANN. "Such dam" must refer to that, because that is what it is.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No. The first words of the section, with the amendment adopted offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, provide that the Government reserves the right to build a lock in a dam, and then it goes ahead and says that "the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed in any such dam," namely, the dam that the Government decides to build a lock in, and so on.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman propose to change it?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I propose to change it so as to read "any dam built under the provisions of this act."

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any objection to that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it makes any difference.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It removes the possibility of raising a question; and at least there is a possibility of contending that the word "such" in there means——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, the committee, in its report, urges the passage of this bill for two reasons, namely:

First and primarily, to promote navigation on streams which otherwise would never be navigable. * * * And, secondly, to permit the development of the resources and the progress of the industries of the countries through which those streams run by encouraging the development of possible water power on those streams.

I am opposed to the measure for two reasons: First, because it is absolutely hostile to time-honored Democratic principles, and, secondly, because it does not square with sound, practical business methods.

My disagreement with the first reason advanced by the committee is clear-cut. I do not believe that this bill will "first and primarily, promote navigation." I am firmly convinced that that very desirable result will be subordinated, and that the first and primary effort will be to promote water power for private gain. The committee's second premise is in reality not a premise at all but merely a tail to the first kite, so that the proposition is that of whether or not this bill, if enacted into law, will or will not have the beneficent effect predicted by the committee.

Has this House, composed of men of wide experience, forgotten that immortal doctrine of the father of Democracy with which every school child is familiar: "Equal rights to all; special privileges to none"? This sentiment has been reiterated by the Democratic Party at every opportunity since its utterance. Witness this paragraph from the platform adopted by the Democratic Party at Baltimore in 1912:

We insist upon the full exercise of all the powers of the Government, both State and National, to protect the people from injustice at the hands of those who seek to make the Government a private asset in business. There is no twilight zone between the National and State in which exploiting interests can take refuge from both.

I can not conceive how it would be possible to engineer a more brazen attempt to create a "twilight zone" than in the case of this bill. Why give this special privilege to water-power monopolists at the expense of equal rights to all our citizens, so that our streams will be made navigable? Oh, shades of Jefferson, behold the water-power monopolists in the light of public benefactors

Under the present policy of river and harbor improvement rivers are not improved unless the territory through which they pass is evidently able to originate sufficient traffic to compensate for the cost of the improvement. That being the case, this bill seeks to secure the navigability of a stream which is manifestly unproductive of commerce by giving to the water-power monopolists one of the greatest natural resources of which the country boasts. The benefits that might be derived from making a given stream navigable can be pretty fairly gauged. The loss through giving away the people's heritage can not even be estimated. Yet it is here proposed to make the exchange. It is a similar proposition to that of the small boy whose pocketknife has a broken blade proposing to swap "sight unseen" with the boy whose knife he knows to be in perfect condition. It is the sale of a birthright for a mess of pottage. [Applause.]

I now propose that if we are to give away our birthright we find a more worthy object for our bounty than the Water Power Trust. If we must make a gift, let it be to the people. Let us improve every navigable stream at the expense of the people of the several States and then let us declare the several States and their people the owners of the water power that has been thus developed The income derived by the States would ultimately compensate for the cost of the improvement, and the people would still hold title to the water-power right and have the benefit of a vast system of navigable streams by means of which to carry on their commerce. If the water-power monopolists can pay for the cost of making these streams navigable from revenue derived from the water power, the people can do the same thing, and in addition keep these great natural resources for themselves and posterity.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LIEB. Excuse me for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield at this time.

Mr. LIEB. I call to Members' attention as a concrete example the case of this good city of Washington. A few miles above the city there is what is known as the Great Falls of the Potomac River. Every Member of the House knows the possibility of that section as to the development of water power, and, further, that the Potomac is only navigable up to that section. Under the terms of this bill water-power monopolists can secure the right to build locks and a dam at or near Great Falls of such a character as to form a pool that will make that section of the Potomac navigable. They then have a monopoly of the water power that might be developed there. This water power could then be sold in the city of Washington at a considerable profit. As a result a section of the country which is not largely productive of commerce would have for the development of its commerce a navigable stream, but the people would have lost the water-power right and extended special privileges to the water-power monopoly.

My proposal is that the Federal Government build that lock and dam and then give to the government of the District of Columbia the water power thus created. Let the District government derive whatever profit is to be made from the project. But the argument is advanced that the people would be compelled to bear the burden of the cost of construction. That can not be gainsaid. But what of lightening those burdens by means of the sale of the water power, and so forth? I repeat that on this basis, if the project should be carried to a conclusion, we would find here a navigable river, cheaper and better light and power facilities, and ultimately, through the retention of the water-power rights in the hands of the people, a lower rate of taxation. [Applause.]

In my judgment there are innumerable legal and technical weaknesses in this measure that are of themselves sufficient to condemn it, but I base my opposition on broad, economic ground. I say render unto the people that which is the people's, remain true to the Democratic faith, and husband for posterity the priceless heritage that is theirs. Let us not follow in the footsteps of our predecessors by creating a "twilight zone," where special privilege can mulct the people unrestrained.

I can not believe that a bill so undemocratic as this will ever become law during a Democratic administration. Should it pass this House I predict for it a peaceful end in the Senate, but should it by mischance reach the Executive, I feel confident that the great statesman and friend of the people now occupying the White House will find expression for a righteous wrath by exercising his constitutional prerogative of the veto. [Applause.]

In this connection I desire to quote an article on Waterway Improvement written by Gen. William H. Bixby, former Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, for the Engineering News:

For future development in river transportation it is far more essential to increase the total mileage for the use of medium draft vessels in the United States than it is to secure deeper draft improvements along the comparatively short stretches of the ocean and Great Lakes water fronts. Ideal transportation will not be accomplished until all rivers and canals may be utilized by vessels drawing from 6 to 9 feet.

The most important function of a river is its use as a free, or nearly free, route of transportation, but at the same time the river is exceedingly useful as a means of water supply for household, municipal, factory, and farm consumption, as a means of dynamic power, and as a means of drainage and sewerage. On the other hand, the river is detrimental and often dangerous as regards its power to destroy riparian properties by erosion, and a source of mixed benefit and danger from its overflow.

As a general rule, the availability of the river for irrigation and power is greatest in the upper quarter of its length, where navigation is impracticable. The river is usually most dangerous to property in the upper quarter and lower half; and its usefulness for drainage, sewerage, or refuse removal is greatest in its lower three-quarters. For direct consumption of its water by people and factories, quantity and uniformity of flow and purity of water are important features; for irrigation purposes the purity usually becomes nonessential; for power alone the quantity of water, its uniform flow, and height of fall are important.

Droughts injure the usefulness of the river for alimentation, irrigation, drainage, and navigation purposes and have but few, if any, redeeming qualities. Floods, though often causing great damage by bank erosion and by property destruction, are yet often of great benefit by reason of their fertilizing deposits, which so enrich the river bottom lands that even one good crop in three years will sometimes render the land profitable to the landowner.

The special conditions most favorable to each of the above functions of a river are so divergent that it is usually impossible to establish any river improvement without detriment to one or more of such functions. A reasonable compromise in such matters is all that can be expected.

Under such circumstances Federal conservation and control of water interests, as a whole, seems difficult and impracticable, except within public lands; and State control within State limits, subject only to Federal control of the interests of public navigation, now seems the only immediate, and possibly final, solution of the question.

While storage reservoirs for irrigation purposes, for city and factory use, for navigable canals, or for power on the upper nonnavigable portions of rivers, are used to a moderate extent throughout Europe, artificial reservoirs at river headwaters merely to prevent low-water stages in the lower navigable river are not in general or extensive use.

The weakest point of any storage-reservoir system for flood prevention is that the most dangerous and injurious floods in a river basin are often produced by heavy rainfall in the middle areas of such basin, while the reservoirs near the headwaters of the river are too high up the river to be of use when most needed.

In many European countries, such as Austria-Hungary, the protection of property from river overflow is secured generally by levees on each side of the river bank of such height and distance apart that the space between them is sufficient to hold as much water as can fall during several days of heavy rainfall in the basin above, the result of such levees being practically to form a long, narrow, temporary, and intermittent reservoir, requiring several days to fill or to empty, along the full length of the river in the place where most needed. The cost of such reservoirs between levees being no more than the cost of upstream reservoirs necessary to produce an equally useful effect.

Such water control by levees for reducing to a minimum the property damage from floods appears to have proved the most satisfactory solution up to the present time.

In France, Germany, and Austria the General Government and improvement associations acquire the riparian properties before commencing or completing the river improvements, by which process the reclaimed lands become sources of profit to the improvement work and help to pay therefor. This practice, so far as legal and practicable, seems worthy of being followed in the United States, and legislation in that direction should be enacted or encouraged for all locations.

The ownership of water powers on existing streams, while a question of great importance, is still not at all uniform throughout the various individual States and, perhaps, not fully settled in the courts.

Except where the Federal Government is the original owner, as within the forest reserves under charge of the Department of Agriculture, or on other public lands under charge of the Department of the Interior, or by special acquisition and act of Congress, the Federal Government has not at present any absolute undisputed ownership of undeveloped water powers.

But on all navigable streams and on those which affect navigation the Federal Government has a limited control of water and water powers. As a general rule, throughout the United States, the public right to the use of a river for purposes of navigation to the extent deemed proper by the Federal Government, takes precedence over all other rights; and the use and control of the water and of its flow within the river takes precedence over other uses and controls.

The general dam act of June 23, 1910, recognized the fact that the ownership of power developed by dams constructed wholly at private expense is a matter for control by the individual States and not by the Federal Government. In accordance with this act, the United States, through the War Department, is empowered to require the dam owner to furnish free of cost such water and such locks, log sluices, fishways, and other auxiliary constructions as are necessary in the interest of navigation and the fisheries, and the act reserves to the United States the control of water levels.

What is most essential is not so much the present development of the water power as it is such an early action by each State as shall assure the conservation of all potential water powers in such a way as to prevent them from being monopolized by private parties during present disuse, and as to make possible at any future day their use to the fullest extent allowable and to the greatest benefit to the general public.

As levees and drainage are built principally for the reclamation of farm land and of other private properties; as irrigation systems are built principally for the development of farm property and the building up of communities; and as water powers are developed principally for the building up of corporations and business concerns concerned mainly with developments within a single State, it seems very proper that all these engineer constructions should be regulated, if at all, by State authority rather than by Federal authority, and that the Federal Government should intervene only as an advisor or a controller, and should be an executive only so far as such constructions reach within the limits of several States or directly affect the development and prosperity of several States.

Because of the present growing probability that the natural resources of land and water must eventually be handled in some such manner as above outlined, it is already urgently necessary that every State of the Union, which has not already done so, should establish at an early date an office of State engineer, or its equivalent, to investigate, report results, advise the State legislature, direct construction operations, and exercise State control of all work or drainage, irrigation, water-power construction, and other water utilities within each State, leaving to the Federal Government the control of only such of these constructions as concern such rivers and harbors as do not properly come under control of a single State.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LINDBERGH:

Page 7, line 24, after the word "works" insert "and lessees under section 14 of this act."

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDBERGH. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Did you examine the language at the top of page 10, where you will see that that provision is already amply made—and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original owner hereunder?

Mr. LINDBERGH. The gentleman may be correct about that, but there are six of these Government reservoirs in my district——

Mr. ADAMSON. The purpose of this language is to meet that.

Mr. LINDBERGH. And I should like to have the same rule of damages apply to those who take leases, as applied to the owners of the original structures, and if there is any doubt about it, I should like to have that doubt removed.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will notice the language preceding that—

And any successor or assign of such property or project, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Where is that?

Mr. ADAMSON. At the top of page 10. It was put in there for the very purpose for which the gentleman suggests his amendment.

Mr. LINDBERGH. That applies to permits to construct dams. I refer to section 14, where there is a provision for the leasing of the power from the reservoirs, and I have not yet concluded that the right to secure damages applies against the people who secure lease rights under section 14.

Mr. ADAMSON. When the gentleman gets to section 14 he will find that it also is amply guarded to meet these conditions. If not, we can amend it when we get to it.

Mr. LINDBERGH. With that understanding, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I object. I want to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects to withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. MANN. We might as well discuss it now as when we get to section 14.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH], who has just succeeded, with his influence, in passing through this House a bill authorizing homestead entries upon some of the lands where the Government has flowage rights and reserving the flowage rights to the Government, has now proposed an amendment which would require the Government to pay for overflowing any of these lands where it has reserved the flowage rights. That is in effect the proposition now pending. The gentleman proposes to make any lessee of the Government pay for any damage that may be inflicted by overflow or otherwise. These lessees are lessees of Government projects. In effect it is the Government itself, because if the lessee has to pay a certain amount of damages, of course the lessee will not pay as much.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I do not ask to have my amendment apply particularly or alone to those who take homesteads on these lands; but there are many other people whom this section will affect, who have lands that may be damaged by the overflow. A comparatively small part of the land will be owned by the people who take homesteads.

Mr. MANN. I believe my friend from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] is going up to make an investigation of some of these overflow matters. I do not doubt that there may be cases where the Government is equitably bound to make reparation for overflow, if the Government did not have the right to overflow a reservation, in reference to these reservoirs in the gentleman's district. But if the Government is under that obligation, the Government must assume it. It can not pass it on to the lessee down on the Mississippi River, away below the reservoirs. The Government must remain under the obligation, and if there be any obligation it ought to settle; but where the Government has reserved the right to overflow there ought not to be any obligation on the part of the Government. Now, there is no object in putting this burden on the lessee, because with that burden imposed the Government gets that much less money for the lease of the power it has reserved or created.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Does not the gentleman think this section establishes a rule of damages different from the common law?

Mr. MANN. I do not. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I put this provision, or one like it, into the first law, as a matter of extra precaution. I doubt whether the Government has any jurisdiction over the subject at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Minnesota. Is there any doubt that it has not?

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly plain that if we give to a grantee the authority to build a dam, and he injures private property in a State, under the State constitution he must pay for the damage to the private property.

In most of the States if he takes or injures the property he is liable for it. The Government has no control over these laws, because they are State laws affecting only the personal property in the State. But in order that we might put the grantees on notice that they were obliged to pay for these damages inflicted, we put it into the various laws originally that have been passed so that they would know that we recognize the fact that they were liable to damages, although I do not think you could bring a suit under that provision.

Mr. ANDERSON. If I understand what my colleague is after it is to make the Government liable where it builds reservoirs in connection with the dam and its overflows.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly the amendment offered by the gentleman's colleague would be effective, because while we have no power over damages to private property in a State, we have control of the question of recovering damages against the United States or its lessees.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I am not seeking to make it apply to the Government, but to make it apply to those who acquire the leases.

Mr. MANN. That is the same effect; they are the lessees of the Government property.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That any grantee who shall fail or refuse to comply with the lawful order of the Secretary of War, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and every month such grantee shall remain in default shall be deemed a new offense and subject such grantee to additional penalties therefor; and in addition to said penalties the Attorney General may, on request of the Secretary of War, institute proper proceedings in the district court of the United States in the district in which such structure or any of its accessory works may, in whole or in part, exist, for the purpose of having such violation stopped by injunction, mandamus, or other process; and any such district court shall have jurisdiction over all such proceedings and shall have the power to make and enforce all writs, orders, and decrees necessary to compel the compliance with the requirements of this act and the lawful orders of the Secretary of War and the performance of any condition or stipulation imposed under the provisions of this act; and if the unlawful maintenance and operation are shown to be such as shall require a revocation of all rights and privileges held under authority of this act, the court may decree such revocation. In case of such a decree, the court may wind up the business of such grantee conducted under the rights in question, and may decree the sale of the dam and all appurtenant property constructed or acquired under authority of this act, and may declare such dam and accessory works to be an unreasonable obstruction to navigation and cause their removal at the expense of the grantee owning or controlling the same, except when the United States has been previously reimbursed for such removal, or may provide for the sale of the dam and all accessory and appurtenant works constructed under authority of this act for the further development of water power, and may make and enforce such other and further orders and decrees as equity demands; and in case of such a sale for the further development of water power the vendee shall take the rights and privileges and shall perform the duties which belonged to the previous grantee, and shall assume such outstanding obligations and liabilities arising out of the maintenance and operation of said dam and accessory works for power purposes as the court may deem equitable in the premises.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "and," in line 4, page 9, and insert the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 4, strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the necessity of that amendment must be obvious to the committee. I do not want to take much time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it is worth debating. The two propositions are coupled with the word "and," meaning that they can do either one or both.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment in the way of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment by way of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, lines 2, 3, and 4, by striking out everything after the word "and," in line 2, down to and including the word "and," in line 4.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the part that is stricken out includes the word "and" that would be changed under the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota to the word "or." The language stricken out is as follows:

may decree the sale of the dam and all appurtenant property constructed or acquired under authority of this act, and——

Mr. ADAMSON. Why does the gentleman object to that if the Government can find a better party to conduct it?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Because the same proposition is contained in lines 9, 10, and 11 on page 9, where it says—or may provide for the sale of the dam and all accessory works constructed under authority of this act.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have been pretty good in regard to the gentleman's doubling up language two or three times. We are not stingy about the use of language.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I would not charge the gentleman with being stingy, but I am certain that he does not want to use the same language two or three times with no purpose. I wish the gentleman would permit me to read the section beginning at the bottom of page 8 with this language left out:

In case of such a decree, the court may wind up the business of such grantee conducted under the rights in question, and may declare such dam and accessory works to be an unreasonable obstruction to navigation and cause their removal at the expense of the grantee owning or controlling the same.

That merely says that in such case he may wind up the business concern and by decree provide for a removal of the dam, or he may sell it. The language I propose to strike out is left in the bill almost word for word. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in one place it is in the bill in italics and in another place in roman. The italics were added after the other part, and maybe they put in the same language twice by mistake.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to apologize.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois as a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, lines 10 and 11, after the word "penalty," strike out the words "the Attorney General may on request of" and insert the word "may" after "Secretary of War."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the pending section changes in a very vital particular the present law with respect to the enforcement of the orders of the Secretary of War in connection with the water power in navigation projects. The present law provides that in case of a violation of the lawful order of the Secretary of War he may cause the removal of the property erected under the act. The pending section provides that he may apply to the Attorney General to institute an action to cause the enforcement of the order.

It is perfectly obvious that it is of absolutely no avail for the Secretary of War to make an order requiring the grantee to perform any particular act if he has not the power to compel the enforcement of that order. Under the pending section he can do absolutely nothing except apply to the Attorney General to institute the necessary proceedings in mandamus or injunction, whatever it may be, to compel the enforcement of his order, because the section reads:

And in addition to the penalties, the Attorney General may, on request of the Secretary of War, institute proper proceedings in the district court of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. ANDERSON. I simply propose to strike out the language, "the Attorney General may, on request of" and insert after the words "the Secretary of War" the word "may," so that it will read:

In addition to the penalties, the Secretary of War may institute proper proceedings—

And so forth.

Mr. ADAMSON. He would have to do it through the Attorney General, would he not?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think he would necessarily, but even if he did, it is at least mandatory in that event, which it certainly is not now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly willing to substitute the word "shall" for the word "may," but it means the same thing.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. But I do not think we ought to use mandatory language to a Cabinet officer.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, as far as I am concerned, I object to the whole proposition, which changes the enforcement of the law from an administrative enforcement to a judicial enforcement.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman imagine that he could get up a legitimate section that would dispense with the possibility of litigation?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. You can not deny a citizen of the United States access to the courthouse. You have to file suit against him and let him plead.

Mr. ANDERSON. The present law—and I understand the gentleman had something to do with the passage of that law—provides that the Secretary of War may, upon the refusal of the persons owning or controlling any such dam, and so forth, to comply with any lawful order, cause the removal of such dam, accessory works, and so forth.

Mr. ADAMSON. He would have to do it just exactly as we have expressed here—by a lawsuit.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think he would at all. It is an administrative proposition. This section changes absolutely the general policy with respect to the enforcement of these orders of the Secretary of War. There can not be any question about that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. All it changes is the burden. It does not change going into court at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I recall exactly all of the provisions in the original dam law, but my recollection is that it authorized the Secretary of War to remove a dam where the Secretary thought it was an obstruction to navigation, if he choose, and it put a penalty upon the obstructor or the owner of the dam who did not remove it when he was notified to, and that was the second remedy. The third remedy was to authorize the Secretary of War, through the Attorney General, to go into court through mandamus, injunction, or any other summary or other kind of proceedings, so that there could be no rights lost on the part of the Government to remove obstructions where they ought to be removed. Of course, if the Secretary of War should come in and remove an obstruction to navigation illegally, he would be responsible for that act, and probably the officials under him would be personally responsible. The Secretary of War would not do that where there was any possible controversy. There might be cases, however, where the Secretary of War would direct the officials to remove an obstruction to navigation, as he does now, in the case of a sunken vessel or things of that kind in a river, where he does not wish to go into court to get authority to do it.

Mr. ADAMSON. What does the gentleman think of the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] that this merely changes the burden, that under the provision to which the gentleman refers the grantee himself could go in and restrain an illegality if it was illegal to do so.

Mr. MANN. The grantee will not come in.

Mr. ADAMSON. The point is that you can not deprive a man of his rights in court.

Mr. MANN. You can not deprive a man of his rights theoretically, but you can sometimes remove his obstruction to navigation, whether he consents or not. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has suggested in the amendment that he proposed, as I understand it, to make the statute read that the Attorney General shall commence the suit.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, that was suggested by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Minnesota to suggest that.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; the gentleman from Minnesota wants to leave it so that the Secretary of War may or shall commence suit without going to the Attorney General.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of War, of course, can not commence a suit. Suit has to be commenced by an attorney. The Secretary of War is not officially an attorney. He might commence a suit, I suppose, if we authorized him to do so by the Judge Advocate General, but the suits on behalf of the Government of the United States are brought through the district attorneys of the United States, and they are under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General. It would be ridiculous, it seems to me, to say that all over the United States the Secretary of War should be obliged to send the Judge Advocate General to commence a suit in any district in the United States, instead of having the regular attorneys attend to those suits. Nor do you want to say that the Secretary of War "shall," because it will be a constant practice where anything is done at all for the Secretary of War to refer certain facts to the Attorney General with the request that if the facts warrant it the Attorney General shall commence a suit on behalf of the United States, and it will be the Attorney General, or the lawyers, who must determine in the end whether the facts warrant the beginning of a suit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That no property or project installed and operated under the provisions or benefits of this act shall be assigned or transferred except upon the written consent of the Secretary of War, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the purpose of financing the business of such owner, and any successor or assign of such property or project, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original owner hereunder.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, line 21, after the word "that," by inserting the words "no rights granted under the provisions of this act and."

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, this section is intended to prevent the transfer of property or any project without the consent of the Secretary of War, and it should be so amended as to include not only the property, but any rights granted under the act. The grantees have at least one year in which to begin the actual project. It would be possible under this section as now written for promoters to get the franchise under the act and dispose of it, quite a usual proceeding in the development of water power, and I think that this ought to be prevented.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all right.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit me to ask, does not the word "project" include rights? Was not that the intention?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I think that was the intention, but the words "install and operate" clearly restrict it to the actual property.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, line 2, by inserting, after the word "project," the following: "or any rights accruing hereunder."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is merely following out the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, and if one is adopted the other should be.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the completion of the dam described in the original approval, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until compensation has been made to said grantee for the fair value of its property, as hereinafter provided, or until said rights and privileges are revoked as provided in this act, or until action by Congress shall have provided for the disposition of the project or for extending the consent of Congress and fixing the period of extension, as well as providing such additional terms and conditions of consent as Congress may deem wise.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 9, page 10, by striking out all of said section and substituting in place thereof the following:

"SEC. 9. That the rights granted herein shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the original approval unless sooner revoked or forfeited, as provided for in this act."

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, this amendment makes two rather important changes in this section. The original section provided that the 50 years should begin to run from the date of the completion of the dam. That is changed by the amendment to the date of the original approval. The date of the completion of any particular dam or project is necessarily more or less vague. There might be disputes arising as just when the dam is or is not completed; and it is very essential in fixing the term of any charter that the date and time from which the charter began to run should be very definite and possible to ascertain, and therefore it is changed by this amendment to the date of the original approval. Under section 9 as originally written the charter, though for 50 years, is really in fact an indefinite charter. It runs for 50 years, or until the Government shall take the property away, or until Congress shall pass some other act, some other law. I believe a charter granted under this act, which is for 50 years, and a long term, should be not only definite when it begins, but absolutely definite when it closes, and the time should be fixed certainly for the end of the charter. If the Government should not see fit to take the property over, and if Congress should not have provided for a disposition of the project for extending the consent of Congress or fixing the period of extension, the grantees would then be merely tenants by sufferance, which is really all the rights they ought to have under such a long-term lease. One other benefit, I think, would be derived from accepting this amendment. I have no doubt that the rights of the grantees under this charter will be in many instances a valuable right, and the conditions and terms which we would fix to-day are likely to be much more generous to capital than those that would be fixed 50 years from now. Consequently the grantees under this act without exception, in my opinion, will desire no further legislation on the part of Congress.

They will prefer to have this charter run as long as possible. Therefore they will be in a position to obstruct or desire no legislation by Congress. But if their term absolutely expires, they are merely tenants by sufferance, and in order to get a definite extension of the rights of a new charter it will require affirmative action by Congress, these interests themselves will be anxious for action by Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My desire in reference to this bill is entirely on the question of making it sufficiently liberal to get capital to invest its money. Now, as I understand the gentleman's proposed amendment, he proposes to have the grantee's rights entirely cease at the end of 50 years. Now, the proposition herein contained is that the grantee can have his rights taken away from him at the end of 50 years on the happening of an event, to wit, the paying him back of the fair value of his property. Now, if your provision goes in there and he is required to get further legislation and there is no provision in there that the Government at the end of the happening of this event should absolutely pay him back his money, do you think anybody would put their money in there?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes; I think they would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In view of the fact that he can not amortize this proposition because of the regulation of the rate?

Now, it seems to me, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Is this on my time or the gentleman's time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not propose to talk in the gentleman's time. I just wanted to call that to his attention as a business proposition.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I am willing for the gentleman to proceed, but I did not want it to come out of my time. If it is my time, I wish to make a suggestion in answer to the argument. The fact that the charter terminates, and the rights terminate under the charter, does not of itself, of course, deprive the corporation of its rights in the property that it has constructed and built. If the termination of the charter also forfeited the rights of the property, I think it is true that no capital would be put in. As a matter of fact, if this amendment were adopted, I think there would be no doubt that Congress would either take the property over or would actually provide new terms for its extension. And I believe my amendment would force the adoption of new terms and conditions, and the gentlemen who have their money in it would be asking for legislation rather than making objections to legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not accord at all with the view sometimes expressed here that Congresses of the future will not act in the interests of the people. I think this Congress to-day mainly acts in the interests of the people, and I think we can safely say that Congress in the future is going to do so.

But, if the gentleman's amendment should be adopted and the rights of the grantee are cut off absolutely at the end of 50 years, without he comes to Congress to get a further extension, I take it, then, if his amendment means anything, that the grantee could no longer operate the dam. He might own the machinery, he might own the plants, but he could not continue his operation; and that would be worse than confiscation, because he would be compelled to continue maintenance charges to protect his property, at the same time not being allowed to use his property. Now, if it does not mean that, if the gentleman's amendment does not mean that he is going to cease operations, it does not mean anything more than this bill does, that at the end of 50 years he can use his property until the Government takes it away from him.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. The tenancy could be stopped not only by Congress but by the action of the Secretary of War.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That can not be done now, provided he has paid for his property. I take it the only thing in the world, as this bill stands to-day, at the end of 50 years, that prevents the Government or somebody designated by the Government from taking the property is the payment of the money. I think the gentleman will concede that under the terms of this bill the property ought not to be taken from the grantee until he has paid back the money according to the terms of the bill. And it seems to me that that would put an unnecessary burden and an unnecessary equation here. Certainly the gentleman from New Hampshire would not want to write into this law a proposition that at the end of the 50 years would make a man, although he owned the property, cease to use it until he came to Congress and got a new permit to use it, when he might be perfectly willing to give it up if the Government wanted him to do so, provided he got his money.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. He would be a tenant in sufferance, and the gentleman just said that Congress would make wise laws in the future. I think that no doubt Congress will provide for the extension or renewal of these franchises. I think they will be more apt to do it, not only if the public interests demand action, but also the private interests of the gentlemen who have their money in there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman this, that there may be some cases where there is sufficient influence brought to produce immediate action by Congress. But the lone owner of one dam, who has got one Congressman to look after his interests, will often knock at the door of the Congress for a remedy. I do not know of anyone who is in a more hopeless attitude in this House than a man that has a private claim bill. I admit that there are many such bills that ought not to pass. But when there is a just claim a man has very great difficulty in getting the attention of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I disagree with some of my brethren on this bill about the penalties that they are putting on the bill, but I am really anxious to get as good a bill as we can to allow the utilization of the water that is being wasted by going down these streams. I think that is true conservation.

But I do not think that we can afford to put provisions in this bill that are either so restrictive that no man can use them, or so indefinite that no man can risk his property in them.

Now, it seems to me that this clause clearly fixes a fair and reasonable determination of this grant, "that the rights herein granted shall continue for a period of 50 years"—from when? From and after the date of the completion of the structure described in the original approval; "and after the expiration of 50 years such right shall continue until compensation has been made by said grantees for the fair value of the property herein."

Now, I take it that the Secretary of War under this bill has the right to fix the date of the completion of the dam. I think that is fairer than to say the date shall begin with the original grant. There are some dams that could be built in this country and completed in one year. Those are the smaller dams. Possibly they could be completed in two years. But the great structures, the great developers of horsepower that would be more beneficial to the country, to the people, and to business are the structures that take years to complete. I happen to know of one that is a possibility which will probably cost $20,000,000, and I have no doubt it will take at least 10 years to complete its construction.

Now, to say that the 50-year term on such a vast project should begin at the time the project is put into practical operation—a project which perhaps would take 10 years to complete—would practically limit the term to 40 years; and to say to the man on a small project, "You shall run from the time of the signing of the contract," where it takes only one year to build the dam, would be equivalent to saying that he would have 49 years in which to get something back, and that, it seems to me, is clearly putting the cart before the horse. The big project is the one on which you ought to regulate the time so as to get your money back.

I do not believe in the argument that there is not enough money in this country, that money can not be obtained to recapture these projects. If the owner of a dam earns small profits and there be not much money in the enterprise, I take it that at the end of 50 years he will go on, because neither the Government nor anybody else would want to take it away from him, since by doing so you would accomplish nothing if he were making only a small profit or no profit at all. But if there be one of these great enterprises that has greatly increased in value and there is a good profit in the enterprise, and that is shown, I do not think there will be any doubt in the world but that somebody will come to Congress, if Congress itself does not want to deal with the people, and say: "I can make better terms with you; I can make better terms with the Government than the man who has got it." There is no question about that. That is human nature. The desire to get a good thing will bring the bidders here, or the desire to get a good thing will make Congress put up the money itself in order to let the people have the benefit of it.

But I think it would be most injurious, if we want to build these dams, to say to capital: "Although we give you 50 years and agree to pay back to you the value of your property when we recapture it at the end of 50 years, you shall cease to use this dam until you come back and get the permission of Congress." That is practicable, because we are the owners of the property. Do you suppose you could rent a house to a man for a year, or rent the ground for a year to build the house on, or for 10 years, with a contract that if you took it away from him at the end of 10 years you would pay him a fair value for the structure, and then provide in the contract that he had to cease using the house until he came back and made a new contract with you? Nobody would accept it. He would not risk his money. Why should you put him out?

In the case of a dam, if you did not want it, why not let him go along and use it in the interest of the people? He is operating this dam. What condition would my friends put the users of that power in? Suppose that dam was being used to light a town, and at the end of 50 years, by the terms of this contract, you say, "Although you own the project you shall not use it," and he has to shut down his dam and say to the people of that town, "You can not have any more electricity to light up your houses and schools and churches until the consent of Congress is given to use it again."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Is there anything in the contention that if you do not begin the period at the time of the approval of the contract rather than at the completion of the project the work would be expedited?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is something in that; but, on the other hand, there is something on the other side. If all those dams could be built in the same length of time, and it would take a short time or a long time—for instance, if we all knew that we were getting back 10 years of our use from the beginning of the project, making it 60 years—that would be one thing; but the indefiniteness in the time of building makes the other a fair proposition.

Mr. FERRIS and Mr. LEWIS of Maryland rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has been seeking recognition, and the Chair will recognize him before recognizing the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the amendment as well as the original clause.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit one question right there?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Surely.

Mr. COOPER. While the gentleman is discussing it, will he please discuss the provision, on page 14, which requires the dams to be completed within the further time of three years, making four years altogether?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I shall have to decline to go into that point.

I quite agree with the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that it is child's play to pass this bill and seem to grant privileges under it unless its terms are sufficiently liberal effectively to attract private capital. If we are to proceed according to the rules of private finance, we must respect those rules as much as if we were dealing with the principles of chemistry itself. I quite agree with the gentleman, therefore, on the general proposition which he states. But, now, with reference to the facts of a 50-year franchise, do the rules of private finance actually require that this Nation, so far as its now living component parts are concerned, shall surrender irretrievably during a term of half a century control over the subject matter?

I have not heard the discussions on this point. Perhaps if I had heard them I should not be in doubt; but I can not help thinking in that connection that franchises granted by municipalities are not frequently of as great a length of time as 50 years, and yet, despite a limitation of 20 or 25 years, the subject matter is sufficiently attractive to get plenty of capital. Why, sirs, under the laws of Maryland corporations that might seek the privileges accorded in this bill for a franchise of 50 years would have their own corporate lives blown out 10 years before the franchise itself expired, because in Maryland there is a limitation of corporate charters to 40 years. Perhaps Representatives from other States will have other experiences of that kind to apply to the argument.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, in view of the very extensive attention he has given to this subject, whether he feels assured that the legislation will be useless unless a period as long as 50 years is granted for the enjoyment of the franchise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that the present law fixes the date at 50 years; and, more than that, this bill puts into the law of the land what is not in the law of the land to-day, and that is the right of regulating the price. Now, that is what the people of the United States are interested in. You may say that the price is not going to be properly regulated. If you say that, why, we might as well abandon legislation and say that we can not legislate in the interests of the people. But if you admit what I believe will be the case—that a reasonable price will be fixed under this law—then the corporation can not amortize its investment, because that regulation will prevent its doing so, in view of the fact that it is going to be paid the fair value of the property at the end of its term, and it should not be allowed to do so.

Then, what are the people interested in—your constituents and mine? They are primarily interested in but two things, in my judgment. One is that at the end of a fixed period the Government may again put its hand on the proposition and reconstruct it. The other is that during the life of that franchise they may receive the power generated by the plant at a fair and reasonable rate, and that is all they are interested in, because if they get their service at a fair price it is a matter of little concern to them who owns the dam and who controls it. Now, that being so, both of these propositions are in this bill without a contest. If the American people can get capital to develop the water power to furnish them light and heat, to create factories and foundries and employ labor, if they are assured that at the end of the fixed period they may recapture the franchise and readjust the conditions, and if during that period there is a fair and reasonable regulation of the price by public authority, I contend that it is not necessary to go further, and that when you put in your contract, as my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] would have you do, the proposition that at the end of 50 years possibly Congress will not for years afterwards live up to its contract and give you back the fair value of the property—not of the franchise or good will, but merely of your property that you put in there—and that you must sit around and can not use your property while you are waiting for Congress to take it away from you—it seems to me that that is absolutely unreasonable.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this law would not be reasonably effective in attracting private capital to develop the water power if the limit were 30 years instead of 50 years?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it would. I am free to say that there are cases where it will probably take a small consideration to create a very great horsepower. You might invite men in to invest for 30 years or for 20 years, but this bill is being built for all cases. There are a great many cases that may be developed where it is of doubtful expediency, where electric power has no market, where one must create use for the power before he can get any money out of it. It takes time to do that. We are not writing the bill for a particular case. If you had a fall creating a great horsepower situated close to the city of Baltimore, I can see how you might grant a franchise in that instance and have it a valuable proposition lasting only 20 years. But suppose you have it in an interior county in Alabama, where there is no great city built to consume the power; where, after you create an immense horsepower, you must invite capital and invite people to come there and consume it. You must have time to build up your market. Therefore I say let us be reasonable about this proposition; let us give the opportunity on the average to invite capital to put its money into these projects clearly in the interest of the American people, if the promise of this bill is carried out, and reasonable regulation is furnished that will insure the users of that power a fair and reasonable value.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is a limitation put in section 12 of the bill that the dam must be completed within three years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I overlooked that proposition. It was not in the original bill, but was put in by amendment. I am not objecting to that, although I think that very provision limiting the building of a dam to three years will wipe out some of the largest structures of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland had the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is right, if he makes that point. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama may be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There are a number of great water-power possibilities in this country that the gentleman is familiar with; Muscle Shoals, for instance. That dam could not possibly be built within three years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman. I think this bill would exclude a dam at Muscle Shoals, because it could not be constructed within three years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. All authority, however, to build a dam has to be given by a special act of Congress, and in such case we would be compelled to provide in the special bill additional time for such project.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. What was the time recommended by the engineers in the report to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as to the construction of a dam at Muscle Shoals, and the term of the grant?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not recollect.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think it was 5 to 10 years for construction, and 100 years for the grant, or it could not be financed. That report was made after a very careful and thorough examination by a very able board of engineers, and President Roosevelt advised a term of 99 years for the Rainy River Dam.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I recognize that some of the biggest dams, like that at Muscle Shoals under the report of the engineers of the War Department, could not be built within three years. I am anxious that the bill should go to the Senate. I realize that we will have to face many things, and that the bill will be largely written in conference, where such things are taken care of. That is the reason I have not offered amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, when the length of the term of 50 years was first suggested to me as an appropriate term, I thought it was too long. At the beginning of the hearing before the Public Lands Committee I thought it was too long, and I had intended to offer an amendment to make it shorter, because the truth is that hydroelectric power is only 24 years old. It was born at Ames, Colo., in 1890, when the first project in the whole world was started. As I say, I thought 50 years was too long, but upon consultation, and having before us authorities which we thought were the best, like ex-Secretary Fisher, the present Secretary Lane, and ex-Forester Gifford Pinchot, who were all of the opinion that the maximum should be 50 years, I have become convinced that 50 years as a maximum is the proper term. It is the maximum. I am not in favor of more. I want 50 years to be the outside, to be the maximum—I want it to be the end. I am fearful as I read section 9 that it is much more. I know that the House wants to get through with this bill and I am sorry to detain the committee, but to my mind this is of so much more importance than the question of the charge for rental that I feel it incumbent on me to say a word. The section starts out with a 50-year term, but it does not stop there. Listen to the reading of the provision on page 10, line 12:

> And after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until compensation has been made to said grantees for the value of its property as hereinafter provided.

Mr. Chairman, it is fair to say that in time the Federal Government when it has exercised the right to retake or to take the property at all if a public purpose or interest may be shown may take it by condemnation, and this may be done irrespective of any recapture section that we may write into the law. So in the last analysis as that language reads, or at least as I understand it, it is not 50 years, but I fear it is forever, until the Federal Government comes in and appropriates money to take it away. I do not think the committee ought to ask that that be done. Water power as applied to hydroelectric power is only 24 years old. We are in this bill granting a term of 50 years. With that additional language we are granting a much longer term. Why? Because at the end of 50 years what does Congress have to do? It has to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to buy that plant and pay the fair value for it, and that means nothing more nor less than condemnation proceedings. Does anyone think that the American Congress at the end of 50 years would appropriate sufficient money to buy water-power plants and all of the accessory works that go with them? My thought is that when the 50-year term expires Congress will do what it often does—just stand by and let them go on and on, and probably not even fix the conditions that are due the American people at the expiration of the term.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has himself introduced a bill in this House that provides for a 50-year grant and that at the end of that time if the power is taken away the reasonable value shall be paid for it. What is the difference between the "reasonable" and "fair" value of it?

Mr. FERRIS. I will deal with that. In the first place, section 5 of our bill does not say for 50 years. It says for a period not greater than 50 years, and it leaves it to the Secretary to say whether or not it shall be even the full term of 50 years; but at the end of 50 years it provides three things that Congress can do. First, Congress may take it over, if it wants to, which it probably will never do; second, Congress can fix new conditions, and allow the same company to re-lease it under a new lease or grant, and that is something that Congress ought to do; and third, Congress can lease it to a third and new party altogether, which is a thing that it probably might want to do. Those are the three specific things provided for in sections 5 and 6 of our bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me first reply to the gentleman from Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] suggests to this House and seems to think that at the expiration of 50 years a standstill would come, whereby havoc and disaster would come to the water-power company. No one favors that. I think no such thing would or could happen. If I thought that he was right in that contention, I would stand with him immediately and continue to stand with him. But he is not right about that. What will happen at the end of 50 years or before the end of 50 years? The water-power companies will come to Congress, or to the Secretary of War, or to the body that has control of the matter at that time and secure an additional franchise or extension of the franchise. The reason and the advisability of having that provided for is so that Congress or anyone may then apply the safeguards; may then apply the regulations that in the light of the experience of 50 years we will know should be applied.

Is there anyone here who knows what the growth and development of water power will be in 50 years? It is only 24 years old to-day. Its uses multiply with the close of each day. We light our cities with it and our homes. We heat our homes with it and we cook our food with it; run our street cars; run our railroads, our sewing machines, our electric fans; run our vehicles and do every conceivable thing with it when it is yet an infant only 24 years old. Who knows what we will use it for at the expiration of 74 years, the age it will be plus the 50-year term provided for herein. For that reason I greatly hope that this House may pause for a moment and look at section 9, and I greatly hope that the chairman of the committee and the leader of the House [Mr. UNDERWOOD] may both pause for a moment and see to it that instead of granting a 50-year term we do not grant a much longer term.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman recalls that this bill requires that the rates and prices are subject to regulation and change every 10 years.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; according to the amendment that has been adopted.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true only as to the charge. The Sherley amendment provides that we may regulate it at the end of 20 years, and every 10 years thereafter. That refers to the charge and none of the other regulations. That may bring about the very thing that the gentleman from Alabama fears it will—namely, scare away capital, but I believe that 50 years is enough. I do not believe there ought to be any entangling threads or alliances that will let the water-power concern continue to hold it after the 50 years have passed. It is so easy to contend that Congress intended that their rights be perpetual we can scarcely be too careful about what we do. Fifty years is a good, long franchise. It is a franchise that will run beyond the lives of most, if not all, of us here to-day. I repeat we can not be too careful.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman provides in his bill that at the expiration of 50 years there are three things which may be done. One is a lease may be granted to another party and other parties than the one originally granted.

Mr. FERRIS. That is one of the things; yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, what becomes of the property of the original grantee?

Mr. FERRIS. We provide for that and it is a rule that ought to be laid down——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is it?

Mr. FERRIS. We provide that we pay the actual cost for all the property that is nonperishable in character—land, water rights, and anything that will not perish by age and use—and we provide for the fair value for that which is perishable in character, such as machinery, buildings, and so forth. Now, let me proceed further. Both of those provisions are in the interest of the public as distinguished from being in the interest of the power companies.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me finish this. Both are in the interest of the public. First, because if we get the land back and the nonperishable stuff back at actual cost the public gets the benefit of the growth and increase of the value under the 50-year provision instead of the water-power company; and on the other hand, when we take the perishable property back, such as the buildings, houses, and machinery, which may decay or rust away, we get that at the depreciated value which is the fair value in the interest of the public, because that property is more apt to depreciate than to go up and we give the fair value when we take it over. Does that answer the gentleman? Is not that in the public interest? Is not that what we ought to do?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just referred to the gentleman's bill and I find no language in section 5 that sustains the statement the gentleman made a moment ago.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman let me take the copy for just a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I have two or three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Oklahoma proceeding for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman to read section 5 to the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I will be glad to do so, and this section——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the section about recapture.

Mr. FERRIS. I will be glad to read it to the House. Section 5 of the bill reported by our committee, and I desire Members of the House not to think there is anything antagonistic between the committee, because there is not. These bills are not in conflict over subject matter. One of them deals with the navigable waters of the United States and the other bill has reference to the nonnavigable waters on public lands. There is no navigation in my State, and there is not a bit of water power in my State, so I have no interest in that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is any conflict between the two bills. Neither charges anything whatever for the good will or franchise. Now, the bill of the gentleman provides that the land on which the house is built, the land acquired, which is small, shall be repurchased at the actual cost, and that for the balance of the property a reasonable price shall be paid. This bill simply provides there shall be nothing paid for franchise or good will and the fair value of the property. Now, that is the only distinction. But if the gentleman will read section 5 of his bill he will see that he makes a condition precedent to the Government taking up the franchise that it shall be paid for.

Mr. FERRIS. I will read the section so that we can understand it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Alabama has just said there is no conflict between the bill reported by the Public Lands Committee and the bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The reason is because the subject matter is different.

Mr. FERRIS. That is what I intended to say.

Mr. COOPER. It is very important it should be put in there, because a reader of the debates would not so understand it.

Mr. FERRIS. I thought I had already stated that these two bills dealt with a different subject matter, and hence, so far as the subject matter is concerned, I think there is no conflict.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman has stated that before.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Alabama suggested I read section 5, and I will read it:

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice prior to the expiration of any lease under this act the United States shall have the right to take over the properties which are dependent, in whole or in part, for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, and which may have been acquired by any lessee acting under the provisions of this act, upon condition that it shall pay, before taking possession, first, the actual costs of rights of way, water rights, lands, and interests therein purchased and used by the lessee in the generation and distribution of electrical energy under the lease, and, second, the reasonable value of all other property taken over—

I think that is what I said—including structures and fixtures acquired, erected, or placed upon the lands and included in the generation or distribution plant, and which are dependent as hereinabove set forth, such reasonable value to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the lessee, and, in case they can not agree, by proceedings instituted in the United States circuit court for that purpose: Provided, That such reasonable value shall not include or be affected by the value of the franchise or good will or profits to be earned on pending contracts or any other intangible element.

And I make no point of that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has read as far as I wanted him to go, because the question as to whether it should be reasonable value or fair value is a question that comes in section 10 of this bill, and is not involved. But the question, I said, was in the first bill, and there is a condition precedent that the property should be paid for in section 5.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me proceed just a moment further. Section 6 was the thing that the gentleman thinks the bill does not do. Section 6 does the precise thing I said it did.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me call your attention to your own bill just a moment. It was the proposition I was calling the gentleman's attention to:

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice prior to the expiration of any lease under this act the United States shall have the right to take over the properties which are dependent, in whole or in part, for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, and which may have been acquired by any lessee acting under the provisions of this act, upon condition that it shall pay, before taking possession—

And so forth.

That is what I said. The gentleman writes in a bill here a condition precedent that the Government must pay a reasonable price for the property. He proposes to support the gentleman from New Hampshire, and he says that you can destroy the property by its nonusage and you can make the man who took it wait until he gets consent to use it. Now, your very bill provides as a precedent, no matter what you do afterwards—and I admit you do provide for other conditions—a condition precedent that the Government must pay for the property. And that is right. You were right to put it in there.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did lay down two propositions in my first speech. I will now refer directly to the gentleman. I first say that we provide actual cost for nonperishable property and a fair value for all perishable property. I also assert this to be the proper rule in the interest of the public.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield right there? I wanted to know what the gentleman means by actual cost?

Mr. FERRIS. Actual cost to the power people at the time of purchase.

Mr. MADDEN. You do not say so.

Mr. FERRIS. There is no question about it, as you will find if you read the bill. Section 5 does not say precisely what I said it did, but it was my error in stating it was section 5. I should have stated it was sections 5 and 6. Sections 5 and 6 do the exact things that I stated the bill did. Let me read that:

SEC. 6. That in the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over, maintain, and operate the properties as provided in section 5 hereof, or does not renew the lease to the original lessee upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as may be authorized under the then existing applicable laws, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, upon the expiration of any lease under this act, to lease the properties of the original lessee to a new lessee upon such terms, under such conditions, and for such periods as applicable laws may then authorize, and upon the further condition that the new lessee shall pay for the properties as provided in section 5 of this act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is getting away from the proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. No; I am not. I am right on the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you want the Government to lease it to somebody else, that is a different question. But the question involved here is whether you can start the machinery before the Government pays for it, and in your own bill you provide as a condition precedent that it shall be paid for before the machinery stops.

Mr. FERRIS. The leader of the House is so much more able as a debater that I hope he will let me go on. I assert that section 5 does precisely what I said it did in the first instance, provides for the nonperishable property at actual cost and the other at fair value, and I again assert that both are in the interests of the public. And I now assert, as I should have done before, but I did not have the bill before me, that that section authorizes the Government—to do what? Three separate and distinct things. I assert that under its terms the Government can take it itself if it desires to do so. I assert that in all probability it will not do that, although many municipalities may want to do so. Second, we authorize the Government to re-lease it on new conditions to the first grantee. Third, it authorizes the Government to take it away entirely and let it go to a new man or a new company if that first company fails to do its full duty. In this instance the Federal Government and the public interests have three definite alternatives, whereas under the section as written you can do but one thing, and that is that the Federal Government appropriate enough money to pay for the property and take it over, a thing that they will probably never do.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I want to ask you if under the terms of this act a municipality would have the power to condemn the property privileges? Would they have the right to do so under the license conferred by this act?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so. The chairman of the committee having this bill in charge would be much better authority than I on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. All time has expired on this amendment.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to vote if the committee is ready. I do not want to cut off the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think there are some things that should be stated before a vote is taken.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question or two if I could get a minute, and then I want the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] recognized and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] recognized.

Mr. FERRIS. If I can answer the question, I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think you recognize, from your remarks, that the Secretary of War may do just what your bill provides, elect some other person to take the property.

Mr. FERRIS. If that be true, and I do not think it is, it should be modified. Section 9 provides that the Government can do but one thing. I thought if that language does appear elsewhere undoubtedly this section should be amended.

Mr. ADAMSON. In reality there are not two substantial differences in the provisions of the two bills.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I yield to my friend from New Hampshire. But I want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] or the gentleman from New Hampshire—either one of them—a question first.

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield to the abler of the two.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have heard you gentlemen, as I heard the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], talk about the inertia of Congress. I understand that you propose that the rights of the parties shall absolutely lapse at the end of 50 years. The enterprise is to go out of business, and it will have nothing at the end of that term. Now, suppose Congress takes the property over. That is confiscation.

Mr. FERRIS. The owner of the dam can do precisely what the street-car franchisees do. We do not grant an indefinite franchise to a street-car company. We grant a franchise for a certain period of time. Nobody assumes that they have to tear up their tracks when the term is out. They simply must come back and submit to the new conditions that are imposed.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have it provided in the bill that Congress shall have the right at the end of 50 years to make new terms and conditions. If you can not trust Congress, I do not know whom you can trust.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They would say that at the end of 50 years you must stop the wheels.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; you say that at the end of 50 years the lights must go out, and the cars that are run by electricity must stop, and the plant must cease operations, because if the man's property is confiscated he will not keep it in repair, and for 10 years before the expiration of the period he will not keep it in repair; and until the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from New Hampshire can answer me clearly and reasonably and assure me that some provision will be provided or made to prevent this contingency, I can not see any merit in their reasoning.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Every word that the gentleman says is in support of a perpetual grant, to the end that there may be no difficulty in the exercise of this permit. The gentleman ought to know that there is no more difficulty in making new negotiations at the end of 50 years than there would be at the end of 100 years.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Oklahoma knows that I do not favor a perpetual grant. I have announced many times that I do not favor a perpetual grant. This provision is written in harmony with his own bill, with one provision in addition to that in his bill, covering the use of dams on the public domain. What I want to see is that it is made definite and certain enough, so that a man's property will not be cut off at the end of 50 years, so as to induce him to build the dam. If Congress should fail to renew the consent and provide additional conditions, of course the fellow has got to pull up and leave, and leave his property there. Now, instead of answering that, the gentleman from Oklahoma states that I am in favor of a perpetual grant.

Mr. FERRIS. I did not say that.

Mr. ADAMSON. You say that my argument sustains that position. My argument is in favor of allowing the other side to know what his rights will be at the end of 50 years, so that we can persuade him to build the dam.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me one sentence, to make an argument?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Minnesota can get all the time he wants.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If such conditions as the gentleman states will ever happen, if this amendment be adopted, new legislation will be enacted for the proper extension of the franchise, and this will enforce it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there are two matters which the committee should have clearly in mind before it votes on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS]. The first is that a proposition of this kind of any importance can not get under way to do a profitable business for a term of years. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] showed that every water-power project requires some time in which to fairly start its business. It needs to be organized and worked up, which requires time and money. Some of them require 10 years before they can get fairly on their feet. Any man with any sense in constructing a dam costing two or three million dollars will try to have it finished as soon as he possibly can, because the expense of interest and fixed overhead charges is running, and he can get no returns until the dam shall be finished. So that it is safe to assume that the dam will be finished by the owner as soon as possible.

Now, at the end of 50 years what will happen under this bill? Just what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] stated would happen under the terms of his bill. If you will examine page 10, you will find that Congress has the option of doing three things: First, of taking the property for public use at a fair value; second, to allow it to be taken by any person authorized by Congress, turning it over to anybody else who can handle it better, also for a fair value; and, third, by making terms, as Congress may deem wise, as provided by lines 18, 19, and 20, exactly as the gentleman from Oklahoma contends is the case under his bill. In the franchises in Massachusetts and New Hampshire there is an indeterminate term, subject to practically the same conditions provided here. That is exactly what we try to do—to grant a fair, definite, fixed term, and then an indeterminate term, subject to recall or change on a year's notice.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I can not yield now. That is exactly what we wish to do. We have, first, a fixed term, and then Congress can do as it pleases, as stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] in his bill, so that the Government and the people served by it can enjoy all the benefits accruing from the operation of this franchise. Otherwise the property used under franchise will run down and deteriorate and the people can not get the service, and the water resources of the region will not be developed and adequately used. Remember, the people have a right to good service, sure service, as well as low prices, and they can not get them with a plant running down toward the end of its term.

Now, what do you plan shall happen at the end of 50 years? Right now in this House there are several measures pending to extend the time for finishing dams already commenced. Nobody can tell when Congress will act upon matters of that kind. They may never be acted upon, and the owners who began in good faith may be ruined by our delay and nonaction. I instanced the other day in the general debate the fact that we from Minneapolis and St. Paul have been trying for three years to induce Congress to act upon the disposal of the power of one of its Government dams between our cities.

Nobody can tell or prophesy what Congress will do in a matter of this kind, or when it will act, though I have urged it in and out of season. The power will be wasted, fair understanding will be violated, and plans in larger public improvements will be frustrated. Remember these are matters actually before you right now in which these losses are being suffered. Why can you assume a better condition at any time hereafter? A prudent man will not. None of you dare to fairly assume any improvement, for the very good reason that we are unfitted by our pressure of business to deal with the details of such matters. These must be left to our administration officials if we desire efficient public service. That condition is always possibly to be expected. It will grow worse instead of better with the increased pressure of our business. No one can foresee; and it seems to me if we compel Congress to act affirmatively at any fixed time in the future, these projects are almost sure to fail on that account.

We ought to provide that the projects shall continue under proper regulations, that proper service and prices shall continue, and then give Congress the right, or give some official of the Government the right, to interfere at any time on proper notice, under proper conditions, to protect the interests of the public. Remember, too, that if you fix a limited term without a definite arrangement for the value of the property, at its termination the property must be amortized or paid for during such term. That will compel high rates and possibly inadequate service to the people. The rates must be inordinately high to pay for the property. Then it would be a gamble as to how much could be saved for the owners. That is not the proper way to handle the matter. Make long, sure terms, with low rates, regulated by public authority, partial amortization, with good service. That is the best practice. Now I yield to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it desirable that the cities of the country, on proper occasion, should have the legal power to condemn these plants for their own use?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have no constitutional authority to do that under this bill or any other bill. We could not do it though we considered something similar. We can discuss that when we come to section 14, but we could not do it in any other way.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I want to suggest that we ought to take care of that feature of it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I doubt whether we have the constitutional power to do it. The States can attend to that themselves, subject to our sovereign and paramount rights of navigation.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. If this Congress can make a grant to a private grantee, then in making that grant can it not write into it as a part of it the condition that the State's sovereign privilege of condemnation shall be extended to everything covered by the Federal license?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We can not extend the authority of the State, nor can we take it away, and we do not need to, for the State has authority to protect her own interests and citizens and do what the gentleman desires, subject to the rights of commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will yield, I will state that I submitted that question to the Attorney General, and he held in a letter to me that the States already had the authority to provide for condemnation, and that it is not a Federal function at all connected with this bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The States have the right to make terms as to what shall be done as to the use of the water in navigable streams, subject always to the natural rights as to commerce, and they can make that provision if they please. Congress has no right to fix conditions for the use of the States' power of eminent domain in a matter of this kind.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Why can we not put it in as a condition, when we put property under a Federal license?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We could not make use of the States' power as a part of our contract, and it is unnecessary, as the way I have suggested is easier and surer, and enables the States and their various subdivisions to get exactly what they want if they go at it properly.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the pro forma amendment. I think the committee ought to know the value of a plant of this character. If people in Alabama pay 12 cents per kilowatt hour for the product of a plant of this character, it is a very valuable franchise. A few days ago, during the debate here, I asked a member of the committee about the prices paid for electricity by consumers. There has been no answer. He stated that he would publish it in his speech and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall do so as soon as I can get the time.

Mr. DONOVAN. How are we going to vote intelligently without this information? Most of us are jurymen in this matter. We know little or nothing about it. From what little information I can get, I believe that 12 or 16 cents per kilowatt hour is an extraordinary price. The gentlemen who appeared before the committee mentioned 50 years as the proposed life of the franchise, and from the evidence it would seem that this committee is more generous than the promoters themselves suggested. The two gentlemen who appeared before the committee giving information are speculators in that line. So far as I can find out, they get two or three times as much out of the public for their product as other like concerns get out of the people

Now, if this bill and this report are based on that evidence, it is surely for the purpose of assisting a corps of promoters and financiers who are not going to have any actual money in this enterprise. We have in South Norwalk, Conn., a plant of this character that has no water to create power. The coal and oil which create the power have to be brought several hundred miles. That plant was started by a municipal government, and to-day it is paid for. It sells its power to its customers for 3 cents per kilowatt hour, and they sell to the little storekeeper and the little householder—the men who live in the small houses—for 5 and 6 cents per kilowatt hour.

Now, this great committee, and it is an intelligent committee, seems to have forgotten or has not thought that the customers in this country are the ones to be considered. They should have said, "Are we giving something to our people so that they are going to get power for light, power for the factory, at a lower rate than they are getting anywhere else?" That does not seem to have been in their minds. If you take pains to look at the report, you will see that 30 or 40 companies refuse to do certain things on certain work, but you will not find a single line as to the cost of electricity or as to its being delivered as power at any particular rate.

The truth is that while we are a government of the people and for the people, you have to go across the line to Canadian territory, under a monarchy, to find a place where the people are safeguarded and all these things sold to its people at a lower rate than we sell in this country. It would seem, Mr. Chairman, as if our great statesmen have nothing in mind except caring for the great and protecting the strong.

Fifty years is the testimony before the committee, but I admit that later on they asked for more at the prompting and suggestion of the chairman. When the gentleman from Tennessee asked the gentlemen about creating a trust or combination they had so much money in the business that some one started to develop it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, to show you an instance where the people and their interests are looked after, here is what they do for them in the State of Connecticut. This is a Connecticut proposition. You can not always tell just what electricity will cost by comparison with other places. Here is what we furnish: We furnish tungsten lamps at a price much below cost. We give them incandescent lamps free. We give them arc lamps without charge, and we replace meters at the will of the patrons without charge. Nor do we charge for running service wires to premises unless it is difficult, and, besides all that, we furnish power electricity at 3 cents per kilowatt, and at 5 or 6 cents per kilowatt we furnish the little housekeeper and the little storekeeper. Now, in this committee the price to consumers has been forgotten. The whole aim has been to strengthen, to intrench, and to lengthen for promoters of these projects, because they will not be caught with the stock themselves, but will unload it on the unsuspecting public.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that the Attorney General has held, as a matter of law, that the State could authorize the condemnation of a dam constructed under a Federal statute in a navigable stream?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I did not say that. I said I consulted him about the question of putting in the bill a provision for condemnation of land, and he held that the State ought to provide for the condemnation of land for these water-power projects.

Mr. COOPER. What land?

Mr. ADAMSON. The land necessary to forward the project. Somebody has to own the land.

Mr. COOPER. When it comes to condemnation of this improvement, the dam is the one thing. Condemnation of that would not go to any State.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not mention the condemnation of dams after construction.

Mr. COOPER. That is the point in this case. The people do not want the property without the dam.

Mr. ADAMSON. You do not need to condemn a dam after it is constructed; all you have to do is to confiscate it.

Mr. COOPER. I do not think anybody in this House wants to confiscate private property.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman reciprocate and let me ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER. And I have not seen any indication of that kind.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman asked me a question. Let me play Yankee and ask him a question. If we do not provide some way for him to be settled with at the end of his term, and his right lapses and he has to wait for a new act of Congress and take any such concessions as Congress will give him, might it not result in confiscation if Congress did not act?

Mr. COOPER. There are so many "ifs" in that question that do not rise in the situation before the House that I do not want to take time to answer it. Nobody in the House of Representatives or in the United States of America, I believe, proposes to confiscate private property.

Mr. ADAMSON. Begging the gentleman's pardon, there is no "if" in it. The proposition is that at the end of 50 years his rights terminate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard briefly on this amendment. The vital question in this amendment is one of placing the burden of initiating the action to extend or terminate the term. It is a question of whether at the end of 50 years it is going to be the move of the grantee or the move of the Government. It is a question of whether at the end of 50 years the grantee is going to come to Congress and ask for a new lease of life or whether at the end of 50 years the Congress is going to take some action to terminate the grant. The recapture clause will not accomplish the result expected from this amendment.

I think that the value of the recapture clause in this bill is very much overestimated. The Government does not want these water-power plants. It does not want to operate these water-power plants. It wants the right of recapture simply as a protection to the Government in case the grantee does not fairly operate the plant. It wants it merely as a reservation in the interest of the public. Nobody expects that the Government is ever going to have to use the recapture power. We are simply putting it in this bill as an additional precaution, and that is all. It is a means of bringing the grantee to terms acceptable to the Government in the public interest, but it is a means that the Government would have great difficulty in making effective because of the continuance of the grant until it is exercised. Gentlemen claim that men will not invest their money in these enterprises if there is an absolute cut-off in the grant at the end of 50 years. The answer to that proposition is that men are investing their money every day under just exactly such conditions. I have in my hand a copy of a contract made by the Forest Service with the Pacific Light & Power Co. of California. Article 2 of that contract provides:

Unless sooner revoked by the Secretary, this permit shall terminate and become void at the expiration of 50 years from October 7, 1910.

That is an absolute cut-off.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is on the public domain, and that contract is not hampered by the paramount obligation to navigation, is it?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is an absolute power right without having its benefit reduced by obligation to navigation.

Mr. ANDERSON. But the gentlemen who are arguing for an indefinite term are doing so upon the theory that men will not invest their money under the proposed amendment. Exactly the same argument was made with respect to the Sherley amendment, and exactly the same situation exists there with respect to leases made by the Forest Service in the Agricultural Department, and while we are on that proposition I will read the provision in the contract with respect to that proposition:

To pay annually in advance from the 1st day of January, 1913, to the First National Bank of San Francisco, Cal. (United States depository), or such other Government depository as may be hereafter legally designated, to be placed to the credit of the United States, a rental charge for the occupancy and use of the lands of the United States described and shown upon the maps hereinbefore referred to, which rental charge shall be calculated from the "rental capacity of the power site" as defined in article 1 hereof, at the following rates per horsepower per year——.

It being understood that said estimated rental capacity may be adjusted annually by the Secretary to provide for changes in ownership of lands in reservoir sites and on water-conduit lines, and for changes in length of primary transmission; and it being further understood that at any time not less than 10 years after the issuance of the permit, or after the last revision of rates of rental charge thereunder, the Secretary may review such rental rates and impose such new rental rates as he may decide to be reasonable and proper.

In other words, the Secretary may change the rates every 10 years under this permit. The gentleman from Oklahoma the other day put into the RECORD a number of water-power projects which were being built and operated under just such a provision as this.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman realize this difference between projects such as he describes that may cost $50,000, $100,000, or $200,000, where the grantee can get 100 per cent of the potential power out of it, and a project on a navigable stream that may cost $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 or $5,000,000 out of which the man can probably get only 50 per cent of the potential power?

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, I think some of the projects authorized by the Forest Service are just as big as projects authorized on navigable streams. I do not recognize any fundamental difference with respect to the termination of a grant or terms under which a grant may be made; in other words, in the conditions which the Government may exact in permitting the use of something in which it has some kind at least of a property right and which can not be used without its consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 26.

Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. RAINEY, and Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee divided; and the tellers [Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire], reported that there were—ayes 25, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present. This is one of the most important features of this bill, and it is 6 o'clock. Mr. Chairman, I believe I will withdraw the demand.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was going to move to rise when we finish this section.

Mr. DONOVAN. No; I make the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut insist upon his point of no quorum?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will let us finish this section I will move to rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a motion to rise leaves this question pending?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; it is ended, but I wanted to pass the section.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. But the point of no quorum applies to this section.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; the gentleman from Illinois withdrew it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois made a point of no quorum, which if sustained, would give a yea-or-nay vote on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No; there is no such thing as a yea-or-nay vote in the committee.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that these gentlemen make a motion to adjourn if they want to get out of this trouble.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman will not let me make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut renews his point of no quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. My parliamentary inquiry is this, that if the point of no quorum is good, we vote on this tomorrow in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union again, because this does not settle this question.

Mr. ADAMSON. But the point was withdrawn

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. But I make the point of order he can not withdraw the point of no quorum without unanimous consent after he has made it.

Mr. ADAMSON. But he did do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is simply this, if the Chair understands what the gentleman from Texas is trying to get at, and that is whether or not the amendment has been defeated——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That is the point.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). If the point of no quorum is made.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment would have to be voted on again after you got a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That is what I want.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if the point of order of no quorum is withdrawn, then the amendment is adopted. The question is whether the gentleman wants to make a point of no quorum.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the point is made. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] makes a point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-seven Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16053, an amendment to the general dam act, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12579. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1784. An act restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for reservoir purposes at the headwaters of the Mississippi River and tributaries.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 12579. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill I made a speech on the floor of the House, but have been so busy that I never have extended it in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent now to do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to that, but I will not object to the gentleman printing the letter in the RECORD.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. That is the purpose for which I wished to proceed. Mr. Speaker, and that will be all I care to do. I ask unanimous consent, then, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Secretary of Commerce addressed to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Secretary of Commerce. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, July 31, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17765) to regulate details of majors in the Ordnance Department, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1049), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16738) to provide for the payment of certain moneys to school districts in Oklahoma, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1050), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing the minerals kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, china clay, and ball clay, within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1051), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16720) granting an increase of pension to William McCabe; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 17947) granting a pension to Louis N. Hickey; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 18121) to correct the military record of Stephen L. Noland; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WICKERSHAM: A bill (H. R. 18143) providing for a survey and report upon Dry Straits, Alaska, and an estimate of the cost of dredging said channel, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18144) for the control and conservation of the fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. KEY of Ohio: Resolution (H. Res. 582) authorizing the Clerk of the House to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Jennie Mercer, widow of Philip Mercer, certain sums of money; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 18145) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Burrier; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BAKER: A bill (H. R. 18146) granting an increase of pension to Ida C. Wilcox; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLANCY: A bill (H. R. 18147) to pay a certain sum of money to certain railway post-office employees; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 18148) granting an increase of pension to William Hardenbrook; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18149) granting an increase of pension to William Zuker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOWLER: A bill (H. R. 18150) granting an increase of pension to David C. Monroe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18151) granting an increase of pension to Hugh M. Parkinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 18152) granting an increase of pension to William S. Crowe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18153) granting an increase of pension to Washington Kellogg; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: A bill (H. R. 18154) granting a pension to Agnes Hedman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GREGG: A bill (H. R. 18155) for the relief of Jennie McC. Harrison; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18156) for the relief of certain citizens of Brenham, Washington County, Tex.; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HAY: A bill (H. R. 18157) for the relief of the trustees of Lebanon Evangelical Lutheran Church, of Shenandoah County, Va.; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOLLAND (by request): A bill (H. R. 18158) for the relief of the trustees of Urbanna Episcopal Church, Middlesex County, Va.; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 18159) for the relief of the trustees of Carmel Baptist Church, Caroline County, Va.; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. REED: A bill (H. R. 18160) for the relief of Israel Henno; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 18161) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Finnegan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SLEMP: A bill (H. R. 18162) granting a pension to James Morrison; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STONE: A bill (H. R. 18163) granting an increase of pension to John C. Clark; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALKER: A bill (H. R. 18164) for the relief of the heirs of Solomon Cohen; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILSON of Florida: A bill (H. R. 18165) for the relief of Mattie E. Johnson, administratrix; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: A bill (H. R. 18166) to correct the military record of A. J. Henry; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ANTHONY: Petition of J. Dorcas and other citizens of Holton, and Minnie Howard and Otto Wiley and others, of Everest, Kans., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. COOPER: Petitions of Joseph F. Klus and others, of Kenosha, Wis., protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. FESS: Petitions of citizens of Lebanon, Mason, Waynesville, Spring Valley, Cedarville, and Jamestown, all in the State of Ohio, favoring the passage of House bill 5308, relative to taxing mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GILL: Petition of San Francisco Metal Trades Council, relative to apprentice system in Navy Department; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GILMORE: Petition of citizens of the State of Massachusetts, favoring national recognition of Dr. F. A. Cook's polar efforts; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HART: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New Jersey, 10,700 members, favoring Federal censorship of motion pictures; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. HAYES: Petitions of 1,080 citizens of San Jose, Cal., protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petitions of 540 citizens of the State of California, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Petition of citizens of College View, Nebr., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MERRITT: Petitions of Rev. E. J. Goodell, L. G. Carpenter, Arthur Goodell, Miss Eliza Carpenter, Henry Carpenter, Henry Cashman, Goldwin Arnold, Miss Cornelia McPherson, Lafayette L. McKinney, Earl Hobbs, C. J. Matthews, Mrs. Maria Welch, Miss Mary R. Lillie, Mrs. May Vosburg, Eliza Goodell, Mrs. A. Goodell, F. D. Matthews, Mrs. Edna Arnold, Mrs. Grace Curry, Mr. F. L. Curry, Mrs. A. G. Dodge, William Matthews, Mrs. H. Cashman, Mrs. E. Cubit, Edward Cubit, W. H. Coolidge, E. E. Hobbs, Mrs. E. E. Hobbs, W. W. McKinney, C. C. Carpenter, Mrs. Florence Vorce, Mrs. W. H. Hobbs, Mrs. W. H. Coolidge, Clara J. Carpenter, Geo. M. Carpenter, E. I. Dominy, and Cora

B. Dominy, all of Ellenburg Center, N. Y., favoring national prohibtion; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MILLER: Petitions from the employees of the Oliver Iron Mining Co., Virginia district, Minn., and Canisteo district, Minn., opposing the dissolution of the United States Steel Corporation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. O'HAIR: Petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Illinois, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. PLATT: Petition of Baptist Church of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., favoring national prohibition, to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. RAKER: Papers to accompany House bill 17865, a bill for increase of pension for Martha Ann Benjamin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: Petition of International Union of Journeymen Horseshoers against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. WHITE: Petitions of W. P. Rice and 3 others, of Lowell; J. W. Barloe and 10 others, of Malta and McConnelsville; Lee L. Cassady and 12 others, of Dresden; Ora Blizzard and 4 others, of Frazeysburg; A. P. Ong and 2 others, of Stockport; J. L. Scott and 8 others, of Beverly and Waterford; S. H. Windelkin and 15 others, of Marietta; C. W. Adams and 7 others, of McConnelsville, all of the State of Ohio, favoring legislation to tax mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

(Legislative day of Monday, July 27, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe we ought to have a quorum present this morning. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Newlands	Smoot
Brady	Cummins	Norris	Stone
Brandegee	Gallinger	Overman	Thomas
Bristow	Hitchcock	Page	Thornton
Bryan	James	Perkins	Tillman
Burton	Jones	Pomerene	Vardaman
Catron	Kenyon	Reed	Walsh

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is absent, unavoidably. He is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence, on account of sickness, of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I desire this statement to stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. He is paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is less than a quorum of the Senate present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. GRONNA, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. RANSDELL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by A. C. Johnson, one of its clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, and agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. POU, Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, and Mr. SCOTT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. KERN. I desire to have unanimous consent to arrange some committee assignments for the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent at this time to arrange assignments on certain committees.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit any morning business to be done other than what he is asking should be transacted?

Mr. KERN. It is not for the Senator from Indiana to permit; the Senator from Indiana is asking permission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator asks us to give unanimous consent to his morning business, and I wondered whether he would withhold his consent if we asked leave to transact morning business.

Mr. KERN. If it were a matter of this kind, I certainly would yield to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, we can have no matter of that kind, I assume, at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KERN. I am authorized by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to request that he be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Pacific Railroads and also upon the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and the junior Senator from Nevada is relieved from further service upon the committees named.

Mr. KERN. I move the adoption of the following order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana presents an order which the Secretary will read to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That Senator FRANCIS S. WHITE, of Alabama, be, and is hereby, appointed to membership on the following committees of the Senate:

Committee on Indian Affairs, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Senator STONE therefrom.

Committee on Claims, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator OVERMAN therefrom.

Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator KERN.

Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator MYERS.

Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator HUGHES.

That Senator JOHNSON N. CAMDEN, of Kentucky, be appointed to membership on the following named committees of the Senate:

Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator CHILTON therefrom.

Committee on Immigration, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator HOLLIS.

Committee on the Census, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator POMERENE.

Committee on Industrial Expositions, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator PITTMAN.

Committee on the Philippines, to fill the vacancy caused by resignation of Senator WALSH.

Committee on Pacific Railroads, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator PITTMAN.

Committee on the University of the United States, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator OVERMAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the order. Unless there is objection it is adopted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent out of order to introduce a bill for proper reference.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not suppose there is any use for me to ask unanimous consent, but I wish to report a bill relating to the coinage of souvenir coins for the Panama Exposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to submit a report.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair lays before the Senate the regular order—the trade commission bill.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Interstate Commerce I have several amendments to the pending bill which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Nevada state a little more clearly what he is proposing?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am proposing the amendments which the committee determined upon this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments can be offered at this time and will be considered in their order.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is an amendment pending, is there not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will offer the following amendments——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let them be read for information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On page 17, lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the words "and its relations to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships."

Mr. BURTON. May I ask in what lines?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In lines 9, 10, and 11, on page 17. The proposal is to strike out the words "and its relations to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ascertain the parliamentary situation. The Senator says he offers that amendment. He does not mean that he offers it now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer that amendment now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should have to make a point of order that it can not be offered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator from Nevada understands that. The amendment is simply offered to be pending until it can be reached in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On lines 22 and 23, page 17, strike out the words "or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership."

On page 20, lines 11, 12, and 13, strike out the words "and also to investigate whether American exporters have combined with each other or with foreign producers or dealers to control prices abroad."

On page 22, line 21, insert after the word "commerce" the words "with intent to prevent"; in the same line, after the word "production," insert the word "thereof"; and strike out, in lines 21 and 22, the words "of which the commission may require under this act."

Mr. REED. Will not the Senator have those amendments printed so that we may see them before he asks for action. Stated in that way, it is impossible to understand them, because we can not even follow the bill sufficiently to write them in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The several amendments proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be noted and the order taken to print, which may be done before they are reached in order.

Does the Chair understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to offer his amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio? If so, that is the pending question.

Mr. CUMMINS. My amendment covers the same subject as the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on its adoption if it is offered. The Chair was in doubt whether the Senator had offered it or whether he had indicated that he would offer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was in doubt myself whether I could under the rule of the Senate offer it, but I said I intended to ascertain by offering it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will dispose of that question when the Senator determines whether he will offer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I have proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I want to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be necessary to be heard on the ruling.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to say anything until the Senator from Iowa has finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will send his amendment to the desk, if it has not already been printed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I was not quite certain that I understood the ruling of the President pro tempore a moment ago. I did not understand whether his statement had reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] or to the amendment offered by myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It included both. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is pending and the Senator from Iowa now proposes a substitute for it. The question will be upon the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. POMERENE. The question I had in my mind was whether the ruling of the Chair was that I had simply indicated that I would offer the amendment or that I had offered it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment has been regularly offered and is pending. The Senator from Iowa now offers a substitute for it, and the question is upon the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to state that the Committee on Interstate Commerce this morning by a vote acquiesced in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a substitute for section 5?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well. That does not change the parliamentary situation. The question is still on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. There can be no doubt, then, Mr. President, that my amendment is in order?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may we have the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it has been printed.

Mr. JONES. Has the amendment been printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not sure about that. The Senator from Iowa can inform the Senator from Washington more definitely as to that than can the Chair.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the amendment is read, in view of the statement made by the Chair a moment ago, and lest any misapprehension may arise, I wish to state that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is a substitute for all of section 5, save the amendment to that section heretofore adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa has not been stated from the desk, as the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have the amendment read.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now send the amendment to the desk. I offered it on yesterday and I think it was then read, but possibly not technically stated to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has not only been offered, but it has been printed. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 5, as reported by the committee, except the amendment adopted on July 27, at the end of section 5——

Mr. CUMMINS. That phraseology, of course, was used at a time when it was supposed that section 5 as reported by the committee would be adhered to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introductory phraseology will be modified to meet the requirements of the occasion as it now is.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment is now offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by Mr. POMERENE it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

The commission shall have authority to prevent such unfair competition in commerce in the manner following, to wit:

Whenever it shall have reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating the provisions of this section it shall issue and serve upon the defendant a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The person, partnership, or corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint.

If upon such hearing the commission shall find that the person, partnership, or corporation named in the complaint is practicing such unfair competition it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the offender an order requiring that within a reasonable time to be stated in said order that the offender shall cease and desist from such unfair competition. The commission may at any time set aside, in whole or in part, or modify its findings or order so entered or made. Any suit brought by any such person, partnership, or corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district of the residence of the person or of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913 and for other purposes relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission the person, partnership, or corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from such unfair competition, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity. All the provisions of the law relating to appeals and advancement for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply in suits brought under this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the pending question. The Senator from Ohio originally offered a substitute for section 5, which has now been accepted by the committee and becomes the main question. That acceptance on the part of the committee involves an acquiescence in the adoption of the amendment heretofore agreed to which is in the following language:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The rejection of the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio would leave section 5 as it now stands with the amendment to that section heretofore adopted as part thereof. The adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa will eliminate the entire section, including that added provision. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not quite understand the last statement of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio satisfies the Chair that it is a substitute for the entire section 5, with the exception of the provision adopted a few days since, to which the Chair referred; that is to say, the provision which prevents the use of the record in any suit, civil or criminal, based on the antitrust acts.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that, with the exception of the amendment adopted by the Senate a day or two ago, the issue is directly between the plan proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and now adopted by the committee, and the plan proposed in the amendment which I have presented.

I do not intend to repeat the argument that I made yesterday with regard to this subject, further than to say that it is the old, well-known controversy between what is commonly known as the broad review, which submits to the courts the case upon its merits without restriction, and the narrow review, which gives to the order of the commission all the effect in the court proceeding that we constitutionally can give it.

I had referred to the rather famous controversy upon this subject which occurred in the Senate in 1906, and respecting which every Senator is familiar. I had also referred to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. against Interstate Commerce Commission, in which that court had carefully reviewed and carefully stated the law upon the subject and defined just what power the court had over an order of the commission under the interstate-commerce law; that is, an order of the commission other than for the payment of money. The question, however, does not rest there. It appeared in the Supreme Court again in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Union Pacific Railroad Co., United States Supreme Court Reports, volume 222, at page 541. I read first a paragraph or two from the syllabus:

The act to regulate commerce makes the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to reasonableness of a rate prima facie correct.

Orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission are final unless beyond the power that the commission can constitutionally exercise, beyond its statutory power, or based upon a mistake of law.

An order of the commission, regular on its face, may be set aside if it appears that the rate is so low as to be confiscatory and in violation of the constitutional prohibition against taking property without due process of law; or if the commission acted so arbitrarily and unjustly as to fix rates contrary to evidence, or without evidence to support its conclusion; or if the authority was exercised in an absolutely unreasonable manner.

This court, in determining the validity of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, confines itself to the ultimate question as to whether the commission acted within its power. It will not consider expediency, nor will it consider facts further than to determine whether there was sufficient evidence to support the order.

I read very briefly from the opinion, inasmuch as it contains the argument in support of the conclusions that are stated in the syllabus. Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court. He said:

These appeals raise the single question as to whether, in making the 45-cent rate, the commission acted within or beyond its power. As the statute makes its finding prima facie correct, it will be more convenient to consider the case from the standpoint of the carriers, who insist that the order was void, because made without evidence or finding that the 50-cent rate was unreasonable.

There has been no attempt to make an exhaustive statement of the principle involved; but in cases thus far decided it has been settled that the orders of the commission are final unless (1) beyond the power which it could constitutionally exercise, or (2) beyond its statutory power, or (3) based upon a mistake of law. But questions of fact may be involved in the determination of questions of law, so that an order, regular on its face, may be set aside if it appears that (4) the rate is so low as to be confiscatory and in violation of the constitutional prohibition against taking property without due process of law; or (5) if the commission acted so arbitrarily and unjustly as to fix rates contrary to evidence or without evidence to support it; or (6) if the authority therein involved has been exercised in such an unreasonable matter as to cause it to be within the elementary rule that the substance and not the shadow determines the validity of the exercise of the power.

The court then proceeds to cite many cases, among them the Illinois Central Railroad case, to which I referred on yesterday:

In determining these mixed questions of law and fact the court confines itself to the ultimate question as to whether the commission acted within its power. It will not consider the expediency or wisdom of the order, or whether—or whether, on like testimony, it would have made a similar ruling.

I call the attention of Senators to this sentence—

Further, the court says:

Its conclusion, of course, is subject to review, but when supported by evidence is accepted as final; not by its decision, involving as it does so many and such vast public interests, can be supported by a mere scintilla of proof—but the courts will not examine the facts further than to determine whether there was substantial evidence to sustain the order.

This probably is the clearest and most satisfactory expression of the law that can be found, and in my amendment I am endeavoring to make this law applicable to the orders of the proposed trade commission. I am endeavoring to limit the jurisdiction and power of the court to such matters as have been declared by the court always open to the investigation and decision of a judicial tribunal no matter what the congressional action may be—that is to say, we can take away by our legislation an effect from the order of the commission, but we can not add an effect to the order of the commission beyond the limits which are here so clearly set forth.

I refer now to the next case which was decided by the court, which involved——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. Without desiring to interrupt the Senator unduly, I understand his proposition is this: He wants to vest in this board of five men the unlimited power to declare what is fair and what is unfair trade and to take away the right of a court in any case to interfere, unless the court shall hold that there was no evidence whatsoever on which to base the order of the commission; so that the order of the commission is to be a finality with the single qualification that there must have been some evidence going beyond a mere scintilla of evidence to sustain it—that is to say, it would vastly increase the power of the board over the amendment which is now pending offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CUMMINS. To the latter statement of the Senator from Missouri I at once say "Yes." It does give the commission greater power or, rather, it gives its order greater effect than is given to it by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

I do not, however, recognize in the first part of the observation of the Senator from Missouri a reproduction of the law as I have just read it from the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not pause to say in just what respects it is different, but I have just read the law as it has been determined by our highest judicial tribunal with reference to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, denouncing practices as unjust discrimination and denouncing rates as unreasonably high and establishing other practices in their stead, and I desire, for the stability of business, for the protection of the people of the United States, for the efficiency of the regulation of commerce that we are about to ordain, that the jurisdiction of the courts shall be confined within exactly the same limits as is the jurisdiction of the courts with respect to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to get the view of the Senator from Iowa with reference to this phase of the matter: Of course the making of a rate is a legislative act, and so far as that part of the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission is concerned I am in hearty accord with the notion that the court may not review the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission further than has been laid down by the authorities to which the Senator has referred. I understand it to be the view of the Senator from Iowa, however, that the expression "unfair competition" has a well-settled legal meaning, and that when the commission shall hold in any particular case that there has been a violation of this prohibition against unfair competition the order which the commission will enter will be in the nature of a judicial finding rather than a legislative act. Now, if that be so, if it is in the nature of a judicial finding, can it be said that the commission may be authorized to discharge any greater function than that which is discharged by an ordinary referee of a court, which would not be binding upon the court in any phase, but after the report of the referee or the report of the commission is in the court may review the whole case?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is the provision, substantially, found in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa whether or not, in his judgment, there was any distinction between the power of Congress to limit the authority of the court to review the action of a body which in a particular proceeding was exercising substantially the power of a referee of the court and its power to review the action of an administrative body which, in effect, was an act of legislation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the administrative body known as the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises powers of a mixed character. They are often termed administrative. Some of them are quasi judicial. Others are of a legislative character. It is true, also, that there is a difference between the quality of the act performed by the Interstate Commerce Commission when it prescribes a rate for the future and the quality of its act when it condemns an existing rate; that is, when it applies the law to an existing rate and declares it to be unreasonably high. The former is in the nature of a legislative act. The latter is in the nature of a judicial act. Nevertheless, they are both within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and both powers have been constitutionally conferred upon that tribunal.

Before the Interstate Commerce Commission can exercise what is termed by the Senator from Utah—and to which I am inclined to agree—its legislative power, it must first perform its so-called judicial power. It must first examine the rate which has been established or promulgated by the carrier itself; compare that rate upon the evidence submitted with the law which makes it illegal to charge more than a reasonable rate, and reach the conclusion, in the nature of a judicial conclusion, whether the carrier is or is not violating the law.

I do not believe that the trade commission which we propose to establish can enter an order upon certain evidence, and, upon the court reviewing in the way I have proposed in my amendment, protect its order from the investigation of the court, if the facts established, in the opinion of the court, clearly, unmistakably show that these facts do not constitute unfair competition. No more can the Interstate Commerce Commission do so in respect of its orders.

I affirm again, however, that there is no difference whatsoever from the legal standpoint between the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission finding that a practice of a railroad company is unjust discrimination or a finding that a rate is unreasonably high and the action of the proposed trade commission in finding that a certain practice is unfair competition.

I know that the Senator from Missouri will not agree that the phrase "unfair competition" furnishes a sufficient rule or guide to the people or to the courts or to the commission, but I am not arguing that now. I am assuming that the phrase "unfair competition" is just as certain in the law as the phrase "unjust discrimination," and it is upon that assumption that the conclusion I have just stated is based.

Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator is through answering the Senator from Utah, since I am very anxious to get clearly his viewpoint and theory, not to argue the question or try to interfere with his speech, I want to ask him a question or two.

As I understand the Senator from Iowa, he is of the opinion that the phrase "unfair competition" is not limited as some of us have argued, but that it is a broad phrase which will embrace all practices indulged in for the purpose of driving anybody out of business or of destroying his trade. It is a broad, general term that embraces all these evils. I understand that to be the Senator's theory.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is so.

Mr. REED. Of course the Senator will agree that the power to declare a thing illegal implies the power to declare the same thing or practice legal; will he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends upon the legislation, of course.

Mr. REED. I mean, under this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. If either a commission or a court is investigating a certain practice upon a charge that it is illegal, and if the commission or the court dismisses the complaint and holds that it is not illegal, the converse is necessarily true; it holds it to be legal.

Mr. REED. Certainly; the power to declare a thing illegal of course involves the power to say that it is legal. We reach this condition, then, if I understand the Senator: First, he thinks this language is so broad that it covers all of those things which are now considered in common parlance as unfair methods of competition; second, he is willing to vest in a board of five men, three of whom will constitute a majority, the right to declare any of those practices either legal or illegal, as the board in its judgment may see fit; third, I understand his position to be well set forth in this decision which he just read from Two hundred and twenty-second United States, and particularly in the language which he quoted:

> In determining mixed questions of law and fact, the court confines itself to the ultimate question as to whether the commission acted within its power. It will not consider the expediency or wisdom of the order, or whether, on like testimony, it would have made a similar ruling.

The Senator read that language with great emphasis. So I understand his position to be this: First, that this statute is broad enough to cover all of those things which in common parlance may be referred to as "unfair competition"; second, that the power conferred upon the commission is broad enough so that it can declare any of those practices to be legal or illegal, as it may see fit; third, that the power of the commission can not be interfered with under any circumstances or conditions, provided there is evidence to sustain the commission—not the weight of the evidence, not the preponderance of the evidence, but simply substantial evidence. That is about where we come out, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have long ago learned that one ought not to assent to a rather complicated statement without having had an opportunity to examine every part of it. My view of the matter I have endeavored to make just as clear as I can make it. I want the order of the commission, when it reaches the court, to have all of the effect we can constitutionally confer upon it; but it must not be assumed that we can constitutionally make it final.

I give an illustration. Suppose a trader had published an advertisement in some newspaper, and it was charged that it constituted an unfair method or practice in competition, and complaint was made with respect to it, there being no question with regard to the facts; if the commission were to hold that the insertion of this advertisement, without anything more, constituted unfair competition, and there was no question whatever in the case except such a one as would arise upon a demurrer to the evidence, which is perfectly well known to the Senator from Missouri, then the court would have the right to say whether upon that conceded evidence the defendant was or was not guilty of unfair competition.

Mr. REED. I understand that the Senator, if it were not for the Constitution, would not give the court any right of review at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not so say, but I think the Constitution prescribes the very reasonable limits of the court's review when we are attempting to regulate commerce.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I will say that I think I understand the Senator's position, and I think the Senate understands it. I want to put this question to the Senator: If we happened to get a board three members of which were of that bent of mind which leads them to believe in all of these methods of "big business" which are now complained of, and which we are trying to reach in this bill, and which leads them to believe they are perfectly fair and perfectly proper, does he not think the country would be in a pretty bad condition?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, Mr. President; I do.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will let me finish this question, because it relates to the other. If you write down no definition of what is unfair competition, if you leave it a wide-open phrase, and leave that to the discretion of a board, and provide no means by which their action can be reviewed by a court, what is there to save this country or to protect this country in the event a majority of that board see fit to declare all of these practices to be absolutely legal or proper?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can very well, Mr. President, retort that if the court to which the case is brought is of the economic view suggested by the Senator from Missouri, what is there to save this country from the disaster of that opinion?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me answer that right here?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If you pass a law, even in the present vague terms, and it is turned over to a court, you not only have the chance to get a proper construction by the court trying the case, the nisi prius tribunal, but you have the opportunity to have that decision reviewed by the appellate court. You have that much.

But that is not my real objection. I would not vest this arbitrary power in a court any more than I would vest it in a commission. I would never give to a court, to any judge on earth, the power to say what he thought was right and what he thought was wrong and make that the law of the land. I would prescribe by a statute what is right and what is wrong, or at least a rule, and then if a commission decide wrongfully you may rectify that before a court, or if a court, in the first instance, decides wrongfully you may appeal it. But if you do not have that kind of rule, if you do not have any milestone set up as a guide, you then repose the power in a commission that is without limit, and if you strike down even the right to appeal from that judgment as long as there is any possibility of its being sustained, you have put this country in the hands of a commission which, like any other tribunal vested with arbitrary power, may do good, but, like any other tribunal possessing arbitrary power, it may do bad.

If the Senator will pardon me one word further, let us assume that a President should be elected in the future, as they have been in the past, who believes honestly that all these practices against which the Senator inveighs—and I join him in nearly all he has said—are perfectly legitimate and perfectly proper. If he were to appoint a board of this kind, with these unlimited powers, with no right of appeal, in what condition would the business of the country be placed?

I add this, and I am adding it earnestly and as courteously as I can, for I admire greatly the Senator. I ask the question, Does not the Senator think it is our duty to write a rule now that will afford a legal protection against these things?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no doubt it is the duty of the Senate to write a rule. All legislation is the declaration of a rule of conduct. The Senator from Missouri and myself, however, differ with respect to what constitutes a rule of conduct. I affirm that when we say no man shall be guilty of unfair competition in commerce we have laid down a rule that is as well understood and as capable of definite application as the great majority of the statutes which we have enacted. We are dealing with commerce, with business. It has manifold forms. It is of infinite variety; and it is utterly impossible to prescribe a rule of conduct relating to commerce so definite that there can be no difference of opinion respecting its application. We never have done it. No country ever did it. We never will be able to do it.

When we declared in 1890 that it should be unlawful for any person to restrain trade we used as difficult a term to apply as it is easily possible to imagine. The courts have taken that term, have differed as widely as the poles in its application and construction, and have applied it from time to time, and around it has gradually grown up what we may call a common law of the United States. It has been greatly expanded as compared with the law as it existed in 1890.

When we declared that common carriers should not be guilty of "unjust discrimination" we laid down a law, a rule, which everybody recognized as sufficient, but it was more difficult even to apply than the phrase "restraint of trade." Our judicial authorities are full of the sharpest conflicts with regard to the meaning and the application of the phrase "unjust discrimination," for the very moment that you admit any discrimination and begin to inquire what is just and what is unjust you have entered exactly the same field as when you begin to investigate the phrase "unfair competition." In either case we are compelled to draw upon our civilized sense of what is right and fair and honest.

I am not now attempting to give a construction to unfair competition any more than I give a definition to unjust discrimination. No man can define either. There are hundreds of phrases in our law of that indefinite character which it would be utterly futile to attempt to define.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator wait a moment? I have not yet answered the Senator.

Mr. REED. Certainly; I thought the Senator had.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been answering his last suggestion, that we ought to lay down a rule of law, and to that I agree. I was about to say that we do not repose under the amendment I have suggested or under the law with which I am familiar arbitrary power in any tribunal. Arbitrary power is, of course, intolerable.

To say that we give the commission arbitrary power is simply to reassert in another form that unfair competition does not constitute a sufficient rule of conduct or of law. If we are right with regard to the adequacy of that term, then we do not give to the commission arbitrary power, for the commission is bound under the law to apply that standard to conduct precisely as a court would be compelled to apply it.

I understand that all power may be abused, but the fact that power may be abused furnishes no argument for the refusal to bestow it, if the power properly exercised is necessary for the welfare of the people. The power of the President may be abused; the power of Congress can be abused; the power of the courts can be abused; but each of these departments of the Government must have power in order to perpetuate organized society.

I am one of those who believe that in a regulation of commerce where there must be in its administration an intimacy between the Government and the persons who are regulated, which would be entirely improper in an adversary proceeding before our courts, we will be able more efficiently to prevent these evils and bring about a conformity with the law through a commission than through the courts. I do not believe that the courts are organized for any such purpose. I do not believe that their processes are fitted for that purpose.

I will not go beyond the present amendment, but I know, or feel that I know, that a commission might be very helpful to the people of this country in the administration of the antitrust laws. I feel profoundly that if we had established in 1890 a trade commission in connection with the antitrust law of that year we would not be plagued with the great combinations, the monopolistic aggregations of which we are now complaining. I do not believe it would have been possible for these consolidations to have come into existence under the eye of a trade commission, assuming, of course, that the commission is composed of honest and faithful men.

I realize that if these five men were either unfaithful to the trust reposed in them or if their economic thought or trend of thought was contrary to the best interests of the people, the commission might do great harm. I realize that just as I realize that the trend of economic thought upon the part of some judges has done and will continue to do great harm, or rather will continue to render ineffective to a degree a statute that it was believed by its authors would exterminate the monopolies then in existence and prevent the establishment of others.

I would rather take my chance with a commission at all times under the power of Congress, at all times under the eye of the people, for the attention of the people is concentrated to a far greater degree upon the commission which is organized to assist in the regulation of commerce or to administer the law regulating commerce than it has upon the abstract propositions, even though they be full of importance, argued in the comparative seclusion of our courts. If we find that the people are betrayed either through dishonesty or through mistaken opinion, the commission is always subordinate to Congress. I do not mean subordinate in the sense that Congress can compel a decision of a particular kind at a particular time, but Congress can always destroy the commission; it can repeal the law which creates it; and the wrong which has been suggested by the Senator from Missouri could not long be perpetuated, whereas we have no such power or control over the judiciary, nor would I desire that Congress should have any such control.

These are the reasons, which might be amplified to any extent, that lead me to believe that the commission should be clothed with all the power that we can give it.

The Senator from Missouri, if he will allow me to say so, and I do not mean it as a fulsome compliment, has but stated in a more eloquent and possibly a more forcible way the arguments that were made in this Chamber in 1906 against the narrow review. If he will consult the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he will find that every thought which has been announced in this Chamber in favor of giving to the courts an unlimited jurisdiction over the orders of the commission was uttered here then. It was claimed then that if the orders of the commission could not be reviewed in fullness and in completeness by the courts the commission would annihilate the railroads, that the commission would destroy this great property upon which we are so dependent for commerce. The argument is not new, but it has been again put before the Senate. I agree, in a more persuasive way than we have heretofore heard it.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator was so long in answering that I have almost forgotten what I intended to ask him. The question, however, could be put in this way: The bill as it is now prepared, and the language of which the Senator has accepted in his amendment, simply contains this statement:

That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared to be unlawful.

The Senator says that is a rule to govern this board. Is there any rule now as to what is fair or unfair except what the commission may regard as unfair or fair?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is. I think there is a clear, positive rule, because I believe that underlying these words there is a principle.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator cite me to where I can find that clear and positive rule which defines what is fair and what is unfair?

Mr. CUMMINS. It has never been defined. I can say that in my opinion it never will be defined.

Mr. REED. Then, if there is no rule that has ever been defined, why am I not correct in my assumption that by the adoption of this language you have placed in a majority of the board the power to say what they think is fair and what they think is unfair?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it will be the duty of the board to consult the decisions of the courts, the learning of the time, the custom of merchants, the habits of trade, the writings of studious and thoughtful men, all of which go to make up our understanding of the words "unfair competition." It will be the duty of the commission to apply those words in that sense precisely as it is now the duty of the court to apply the words "undue restraint of trade" in the sense in which we commonly understand that phrase.

Mr. REED. Now the Senator says that it will be the duty of the commission to read all that the writers say and all that the law books have said and all that everybody else has said and may say and apply that as a rule, yet have we any rule and can we have any rule developed in that way? When we find here serving upon the committee which reported this bill one class of men who believe that this language embraces only a very narrow field and another class of men who believe that it embraces the entire field, and when we know that outside of this committee there are men like one who testified the other day who asserts that all of the practices of a certain corporation, which shall be nameless, for five years have been of a highly ethical character and in accordance with the highest morals, although there had been price cutting of the character we have described, although there had been the running of corporations which owned and were controlled by other corporations, while the public had been led to believe that they were independent and competitive, although flying squadrons of agents had been sent into the territory of an opponent for the purpose of beating down its trade to such an extent that its agents would become discouraged and would hire out to the opposing concern, and so on—I might extend that—with large numbers of men believing that that kind of competition is perfectly legitimate, how can the Senator say we have any rule?

I do not think the Senator meets this question at all when he goes back to the point of saying that we vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to declare what was a reasonable rate. To my mind that has never been a vague term. It has never been a vague term for the reason that from the first common carriers have been subject to governmental control, and their rates for centuries have been subject to governmental regulation.

The Government has always asserted the right to make a rate which was a fair and reasonable rate, and it has been long ago determined by the courts that a fair and reasonable rate was such a one as would enable the carrier to make a fair and just return upon its investment. That was all determined long before we passed the interstate-commerce law. Therefore the question of what was a reasonable or an unreasonable rate was little more than a question of bookkeeping. It simply required an administrative agent to cast up the accounts, to determine what the assets were, what the receipts were, what the expenditures were, and what was a fair return upon the investment. That did furnish a rule. It may not have been absolutely clear in every respect, but the milestones pointing out the road were set up all along the way. I do not think we answer this objection by this illustration. I do not think, if the Senator will pardon the interruption, that we answer it at all by referring to the Sherman Antitrust Act.

It is true that when that act was passed there were those who held to the doctrine that it was too vague and uncertain; and yet that act was drawn by three of the greatest lawyers who ever sat in the Senate. They employed in the statute terms that did have a meaning in the law; and I repeat what I said the other day, that in the Standard Oil case, if I read it correctly, the plain indication is that if the term "restraint of trade" had not a meaning in the law the court would have held the act unconstitutional; but Mr. Justice White held that it did have a meaning in the law, and that it was a well-defined meaning, although, as I read his opinion, he indicated that that meaning had been somewhat broadened in recent years. Here, however, we employ now, not a term like "restraint of trade," which had a meaning, not a term like "unreasonable rate," which had a meaning, but we employ for the first time in our law the term "unfair competition."

I have said from the first, and I repeat now, that if the Senator will cite me to the decision of a single respectable court clearly defining what is unfair competition, I shall be largely content, although it would require more than one decision to overturn the hundreds of decisions that have been cited here. But in using the term "unfair competition," with no rule of law in the books in regard to its meaning, I come back to the point, How does the Senator escape the conclusion that you are vesting in this board the right to say what it thinks is fair and what it thinks is unfair? And then the Senator proposes to say that its decision shall to all intents and purposes be a finality, and that there shall not be an appeal to the courts, although the members of this board may all be men who never saw the inside of a law book. It might be composed of plumbers and board-of-trade men and trust magnates, and it is not required that any one of them shall possess any learning.

If the Senator will pardon me a further interruption—I will not interrupt him again—I should like to say this: In considering the creation of such boards as the one proposed, when we are about to create them we assume always that the appointive power will select good men, wise men, and disinterested men, and that these good, wise, and disinterested men will do exact justice through all the coming years; but after the board has been created we frequently find that those named are merely human beings—that they have bodies, parts, passions, prejudices, and shortcomings. Here is a board given more power than it has ever been proposed to confer upon a board in the history of this country, and it is not even provided that they shall have any special qualifications of any kind. Now, conceding, as I do concede, that the present President of the United States would exercise his highest faculties of heart and mind in the selection of this board, I can not forget that there will be others to follow him, and that we are not here legislating for to-day or to-morrow, but we are legislating for many years to come.

Neither does the argument appeal to me that if the board does very wrongly we can then repeal the law, because we know how difficult it is to repeal laws of this kind; and I think that I know that before sentiment could be created to repeal the law and strike down the board and wipe out this legislation millions upon millions of damage would have been done; chaos would have come into our business life; every sort of injury would have been inflicted; and I say we have no right here to do a thing and say "We admit it is reckless; we admit it is dangerous; but we do it in this way and trust to the future to justify its enactment."

I hope the Senator will join with me in putting something into this statute, if it is to be passed, which will furnish a limit beyond which this board can not go. Surely we are going too far in setting up a board of this kind with unlimited powers, and then denying the citizens any court review, for that is in effect the purpose of the Senator's amendment. A court review which permits a reversal only when there is no evidence whatever for the board to act upon is a court review that will amount to little, for I can not imagine a case coming under this board's eye as to which somebody could not be found who would insist that the practice under investigation was perfectly fair or, on the other hand, some one could not be found to furnish evidence that it was unfair.

I thank the Senator, and I apologize for the long interruption.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am tempted to return again to a discussion with regard to the sufficiency of the phrase "unfair competition" and the entire impossibility of defining it. We can not define it. If we should put into the law a provision that a white man must do so and so, there is not a human being who could define what "white man" means; there is not a man in the world who is white. Even if you were driven to define the word "white," it would be found impossible to do it; but "white man" has a well-defined meaning in the minds of the people of the world, and therefore that phrase would be a most certain and definite guide.

I do not admit that we are doing a reckless or dangerous thing. I think we are doing a very conservative and sane thing. I say to the Senator from Missouri that I shall be glad if before this bill is passed he is able to produce another phrase which will meet the evil more certainly and one which is less capable of being misdirected or misapplied. I have no pride or claim of authorship in these particular words. I agree with him that we ought to bend our best thoughts upon the discovery of the best words, the best phrase, to reach the thing that we are endeavoring to overcome. At this time, however, the phrase "unfair competition" is to me more certain, as well as more comprehensive and safer, than any other suggestion which has been made.

Mr. President, the commission——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I inquire if the Senator has concluded his reference to the term itself?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not quite.

Mr. CLAPP. When the Senator has finished that I should like the privilege of asking him a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. The Senator from Missouri said that we but lately had an illustration of the danger of appointing to a board of this sort men holding such opinions as would destroy their usefulness upon the board and might impose great harm upon the people. That is true; that is true of the Interstate Commerce Commission as well, and, if the Senator from Missouri will recall the fact, he will agree with me that when the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. were charged with "undue restraint of trade," or with "restraint of trade," there were many eminent men in the United States who otherwise were entitled to the esteem and the confidence of their fellow men, who declared that the practices of those corporations did not constitute a restraint of trade and defended their methods, defended their accomplishments, and eulogized the victories which they had won in the great battle of business. We will have such men always with us, no matter what phrase or what word we employ in our regulatory statutes.

The word "unfair," as has been said so often, is certainly not more uncertain or indefensible than the words "fraud" or "fraudulent." All these things call upon the judicial tribunal or the commission which is to enforce them for the exercise of good common sense, good judgment, or, as I have so often said, the application of the rule of reason which has been vaunted here so highly in defense of the word "undue" in certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Still, notwithstanding all that has been said, I am of the opinion that "unfair competition" does furnish a sufficient guide, and that we can safely commit it to the administration of a commission, and that we ought to give the orders of that commission the effect necessary in order to make the regulation effective.

I am now about to pass to another question, if the Senator from Minnesota desires to interrupt me.

Mr. CLAPP. With the Senator's permission, I should like to get his view, with reference to some subsequent remarks that I may make.

Taking the case of an advertisement, suppose a corporation was running an advertisement which some one in competition with it felt was in itself unfair competition, and the commission should not find that it was unfair competition. I want to ask the Senator whether he believes that action of the commission would be an act such as could be the subject of judicial review, provided we authorized it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think we could authorize it, Mr. President. The amendment which I have proposed does not create any plan for its review.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, I want to ask the Senator another question. Without any provision at all in this bill for a judicial review except a mere provision that the commission could apply to a court for an injunction to supplement its order and carry it out, what would be the jurisdiction of the court? What questions could the court inquire into?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota assumes, I believe, that the commission has entered an order finding that certain persons or corporations are guilty of unfair competition.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. They then bring a suit in the courts to annul that order?

Mr. CLAPP. No; the commission brings a suit to enforce that order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely the same questions, Mr. President, that could be examined if the person against whom the order is directed were to bring a suit to set it aside.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly. Now, does the amendment of the Senator enlarge the jurisdiction of the court beyond the jurisdiction conferred in the bill without either the amendment of the Senator from Iowa or the amendment of the Senator from Ohio upon the occasion either of the commission bringing a suit to enforce its order or the party against whom the order is made bringing a suit to enjoin it?

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill as it now is contains no suggestion of any right upon the part of a person against whom an order is directed to bring a suit to set it aside. I do not say, however, that the omission of such a provision would preclude a person or corporation invoking a constitutional right to appear in a court and assail the order of the commission.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course we could not take away the right to invoke a constitutional right, could we?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not.

Mr. CLAPP. No. Then, what I want to get at is this: What is there in the Senator's amendment in excess of the constitutional right, in excess of the jurisdiction which a court would have if a party invoked his constitutional right? Does it enlarge the jurisdiction?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing, except making the trade commission suable, fixing the venue of the suit, and describing the court in which the suit is to be brought. My amendment, however, very materially affects the order of the commission when the commission brings a suit to enforce it. I am now comparing it with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I ask a comparison between the Senator's amendment and the bill as it stands.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill does not stand that way now. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio has been accepted by the committee, reported by the committee, and is now a part of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I was unfortunate in my language. What I meant was, Wherein does the Senator's amendment enlarge the jurisdiction of the court under the bill as it was originally drawn, which simply provided that the commission could bring a suit to enforce its order and left the party against whom the order was made to his or its constitutional right to appeal to a court of equity under the Constitution itself?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it enlarges it at all. It removes from the bill as it was originally reported a grave, serious, constitutional objection in that the bill as we had it before us until this morning seemed to imply that when the commission brought a suit to enforce its order the court should have no power to do anything in connection with the order; that it became its imperative duty at once to order an injunction upon the mere presentation of the case. We all agree that that could not be done constitutionally. We all agree that there are certain things that the court has the right to review and that we can not withdraw from the jurisdiction of the court. I feared that under the bill as it came from the committee originally the court might declare that we were attempting to take from the court all jurisdiction of a judicial character, leaving it merely the administrative office of issuing an injunction, and might overthrow the entire legislation upon that ground.

My amendment is mainly intended, first, to make it clear that any person who is aggrieved by the order can bring a suit to set it aside or annul it, and can bring it in a certain tribunal therein stated, making the commission itself suable as a defendant; second, to take away from the bill as originally reported the implication that upon presenting an order of the commission the court must at once, and without any inquiry save to ask whether it had actually been entered, issue an injunction to enforce it.

These are the two important respects in which the amendment I propose differs from the bill as it came from the committee. I omitted one other. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, as well as the amendment as it was originally proposed by the committee, limits the order of the commission to corporations. I make it as broad as the antitrust law, and say that persons or partnerships who are guilty of unfair competition may also be prosecuted by the commission, and ultimately restrained by the courts. In that respect my amendment takes the same view of this subject as the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee. I can not understand why we should allow a person or a partnership to be guilty of unfair competition and go unchecked and unpunished, and attempt to visit our wrath only on corporations.

Mr. CLAPP. I am quite in accord with the Senator on that proposition. The point I was getting at was this:

First of all, I am not at all embarrassed over the definition in this bill. I do not even think, as the Senator from Iowa does, that the commission would have to go to books to find out what an unfair practice was; but I am concerned in this: We are dividing responsibility. We are creating one more body to confuse the public as to who is responsible for the nonenforcement of the law. We are vesting power in a body that has not the traditions of the judiciary to protect it from either the approach of sinister purpose or the exaltation of its own ideals. I do not fear the effect of this commission upon business; but what I fear—to paraphrase the language of the present Executive of the United States—is the effect of business upon this commission.

It does seem to me, if there is anything in the Senator's amendment beyond curing the mere constitutional defect of creating a commission without in the law itself authorizing an examination by the courts, that the party who seeks an order to declare a practice unfair competition should have the same right of review as the party against whom the order is sought. If there is any reason for giving what we call business a review, there should be, to my mind, the same reason for giving the party who complains of the practices of business a review.

I am free to say to the Senator that while I am very much in sympathy with him, and very prone to yield largely to his judgment in these matters, as the matter presents itself to me at this time, as between the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which, I understand, attempts to give the party who seeks the order and against whose interest the order is withheld the same right of review which is given to the combination or trust that gets a review when the order is made against it, and the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which contains no such provision, I should prefer the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the point suggested by the Senator from Minnesota is, in my opinion, in neither amendment. I look upon the enforcement of this regulation as a matter of governmental concern. The Government is represented in the trade commission, and the Government ought to be satisfied with the action of the trade commission.

This is not a statute intended to afford remedies in damages to those who may be injured by the wrongdoing of trusts and monopolies. I have no objection whatever to—indeed, I would hail with pleasure—the introduction into the bill of a provision similar to that in the antitrust law, which confers upon anyone who is injured the right to sue in the courts of the United States and recover treble damages; but I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not confound that weakness in the bill with the question we are now considering. We are trying here to make the regulation effectual, not for the benefit of an individual, but for the benefit of society. We are trying to establish a law which all the people will recognize and obey. We are trying to create a standard for the defense of honest business against the assaults of monopoly and concentrated power.

I hope the Senator from Minnesota will carefully differentiate the enforcement of a law penal in every sense except that it has no imprisonment or fine attached, the enforcement of a law for the purification of business, from the recovery of damages upon the part of one who has been injured by the wrongdoer. I will join him in every effort he can possibly make to bestow the right to bring a suit for damages; but just so surely as the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is adopted, and we have first a trial before the commission, then an appeal to the district court, and then an appeal to the several circuit courts of appeal of the United States, this statute will be innocuous; it will fail, because the procedure for its enforcement involves such delay and such disappointment that it will speedily be abandoned.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like at this point, if the Senator is willing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa yields to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator, I trust, will not confuse the point that was suggested by my inquiry with the question of the right of a party to recover damages. I had not suggested that, although I do have an amendment pending for that purpose.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa that this is to be a public law and that the public is interested in the enforcement of the law. What I am getting at is to invoke those agencies and instrumentalities which will result in the law being effective and being enforced. Clearly the combination against which a complaint is made of unfair practice has no earthly interest in correcting that unfair practice. The commission, acting for the Government, of course, has an interest; but it is only human that its interest, at the most, can be subject to those influences that ever are about abating the activity and interest of those upon which the enforcement of law devolves.

What instrument, then, is there, what agency can be invoked, so certain to lead to the enforcement of the law as the right of the individual upon whom the unjust practice has fallen to have a review of the decision, the action, the order of this commission?

Joining with the Senator from Iowa in the broad purpose of the law, which is to purify and clarify the commercial industrial life, I believe that no agency can be invoked that will be such a spur to the active, thorough administration of this law, when an individual complains of an unjust practice and the commission refuses to declare it an unjust practice, as to bring into the avenues of the administration of the law the interest of the individual who has complained and against whom the unfairness is being practiced.

I believe, therefore, as a part of the instrumentality of this law, from the Senator's own viewpoint, the party who complains of an unfair practice should have the same opportunity for a review in the courts as the party against whom the unfair practice is alleged.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not concur with the Senator from Minnesota wholly. The reason I do not agree with him is that what he suggests destroys entirely the value of the order of the commission. We investigated the same subject with regard to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all those who were in favor of withdrawing from the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission the effect which they now have when they come before the court, either upon the action of the railway company or the action of the commission, would at the same time and naturally favor a similar provision in this statute. You can not allow a complainant before the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the event that the commission declines to award him the relief which he seeks, to appeal to the court from the finding or order of the commission without opening the whole subject to a trial de novo.

I know there are many people who believe we ought to do that with regard to the interstate-commerce law, and the reasoning just suggested by the Senator from Minnesota is persuasive. It seems to be founded upon good reason, and yet, however advantageous it might be to allow an appeal of that kind in a particular case, you must put over against it the disadvantage of permitting a court to review or retry every case brought and determined by the commission, for if the Interstate Commerce Commission says to the shipper, "We have investigated your complaint, and we find that the rate of which you complain is a reasonable rate," and if then you allow the shipper to appeal from the order of the commission to the district court, the only question that can be tried there, the only issue that can be made, is whether the rate is reasonable or not. If we reach that point, if that seems to be wise, I am in favor of abolishing the Interstate Commerce Commission entirely. I would not be in favor of establishing this commission if that is the rule to be applied. I would, on the other hand, allow every shipper to file his petition directly in the court, just as I would allow every complainant against unfair competition to file his petition directly in the court, and have the court investigate and determine whether the defendant was guilty or not of the practice charged.

We must choose one or the other of these courses. Each of them has some advantage. It is very difficult, of course, to deny the soundness of the general view announced by the Senator from Minnesota, but the course that I have outlined in my amendment seems to me not only to have greater advantages than the other but to be essential to the effective regulation of commerce, for whenever all the questions which relate to commerce are open for the general jurisdiction of the courts and are triable under the tedious processes of the courts we will soon abandon the effort to restrict trade within the limits to which we believe it ought to be confined.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator closes, I wish to obtain from him the benefit of his investigation of the judicial decisions which have limited or circumscribed or so defined the words "unfair competition" used in this bill that we may know exactly what the phrase means, at least that we may know what its limit is. Have they been along a certain line reaching to a definite principle the same as the phrases "unjust or unreasonable rates" or "unjust discrimination"? Does the Senator think that the decisions have been so clear and so definite that we will understand that term as well as we understand the others?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do, Mr. President. Certainly we will understand it at the end of 20 years of experience as well as we now understand the words "restraint of trade."

Mr. McCUMBER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say that in my view of it the Senator from North Dakota has expressed with great accuracy the evolution or development of the meaning and application of the phrase "unfair competition." I have referred to so many cases in the course of the long time that I have occupied the floor of the Senate that I could not at this moment recall them, but if the Senator will do me the honor to read even a part of what I have said during the course of the debate he will find all these cases collected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say to the Senator that I have been absent for some 10 days, and therefore I have not had the benefit of the arguments which have been made during that particular period. But let me make my point clear to the Senator, and then possibly he can answer my question directly. If I am called upon to apply the term "unreasonable rate," I immediately have in my mind two great principles: First, the cheapest possible rate for the shipper; second, a reasonable return upon the investment for the company doing the shipping. I find no great difficulty in applying that rule. If I am called upon to apply the rule of nondiscrimination, I simply have in my mind the freedom of action of the company to the greatest extent consistent with absolute equality of treatment of all the individuals. In both those cases I am dealing in every instance between the company serving and the mass of people to be served, but in this bill I am brought face to face with another proposition, and that is the dealing between two competing companies, whether in interstate trade or commerce, or whatever it may be. I can conceive many instances in which competition may be unfair as between the individuals, and yet it may be absolutely beneficial to the public. I want some limit, if I can get it, as to how far this commission can reach into that vast field to apply its jurisdiction.

If I understand the Senator correctly, and he can correct me if I do not, his view is that the unfair competition must in every instance reach toward either crippling competition or destroying competition; and if I understand the few authorities that I did hear cited, they were all along that direction.

There may be unfair competition between parties which does not cripple competition and which does not destroy competition. Now, would the Senator have any objection to limiting the meaning of these words by some apt language so that it will limit the jurisdiction of the commission over those competitive methods which either mean crippling competition or destruction of competition, so that after all it is in every instance simply protecting the people against what in the end would be the destruction of competition; or would he allow the commission to go into the old field of ethics of trade as between two competing companies and determine what is right and what is wrong?

If the Senator agrees with me that it should be limited to those questions in which the competition purposely, either directly or indirectly, stifles or destroys competition, what possible objection could there be to so defining it that we will know it will be applied only to those cases?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I stated in response to an interruption from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I do not say that the phrase "unfair competition" is the best that can be discovered. I only say that it is the best that has been discovered up to this moment; and if the Senator from North Dakota can present some phrase or words that will properly circumscribe it, I think he will be a benefactor, and I will be very glad to consider, so far as I am individually concerned, any suggestions which he may make. But I will not attempt to assent to or dissent from the general idea which he has expressed.

Mr. STONE rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, pertinent to what the Senator from North Dakota says and what the Senator from Iowa has said in response, I would like to have the opinion of the learned Senator from Iowa as to this suggestion, for I intend it only as a suggestion: If the first clause of section 5, namely, "that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful," should be eliminated and displaced by the expression which I now read or some other equivalent phrase, would not that come more nearly meeting the objections which have been raised against the term "unfair competition"? I read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any corporation to engage in any unfair or oppressive trade practice in the course of commerce as herein defined with the intent and purpose of destroying or unreasonably hindering the business of another or preventing another from engaging in business; and it shall also be unlawful for any corporation to engage in any unfair or oppressive trade practice in the course of intrastate commerce with the intent, purpose, and probable direct effect of destroying or unreasonably hindering the interstate or foreign business of another, or of preventing another from engaging in such business.

Following that by striking out the second clause in section 5 and inserting:

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent any corporation from using any trade practice herein and hereby declared to be unlawful.

And so phrasing the remaining clauses of the section as to conform to that general purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to express an opinion with regard to the matter just suggested by the Senator from Missouri. It is entitled to consideration. There is in my mind, though, all the while, the idea that was brought forward by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. The unfair competition with which the public is concerned is unfair competition that is inconsistent with or repugnant to the continuance of competition as a force in the business life of the country. I do not think of it so much as a wrong upon the individual as I do as an offense against the whole people.

But, Mr. President, I have unwittingly and unintentionally occupied a vast amount of time this morning already, discussing things that were not within my purpose when I rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator concludes, he said he would be glad if I would make some suggestion in the line of definition which would indicate the suggestions that I made, and I ask the Senator what objection there would be to this definition:

The words "unfair competition" as used herein shall be construed to mean such unfair means or methods as shall be intended to or which shall directly or indirectly stifle or destroy competition.

That would at least bring it clearly within what I would at least like to limit the jurisdiction of this commission, so that it shall be a commission more to protect the public than to protect one great trading company as against another trading company.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that the phase of the subject just brought forward by the Senator from North Dakota, as well as the phase presented by the Senator from Missouri, are very good illustrations of the general difficulty in defining these words, although every Senator here has a perfectly clear conception of what he would do in a particular case if he were asked to apply the test—unfair competition. However, I commend these things to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who leads the committee with regard to the bill, and I proceed simply now to cite the cases from which I intended to read, but I shall not consume the time to do so. I cite these cases to show clearly just what jurisdiction the courts have over the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I cite them further because they present most persuasive arguments in favor of continuing the policy that we have already adopted.

First, in addition to the opinions already mentioned I cite the case of Procter & Gamble Co. against the United States, in Two hundred and twenty-fifth United States Supreme Court Reports, at page 282; also the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., in Two hundred and twenty-seventh United States Supreme Court Reports, at page 88; also the case of the Kansas City Southern Railway Co. against the United States, in Two hundred and thirty-first United States Supreme Court Reports, at page 423.

Mr. President, I have concluded what I desire to say with regard to the amendment I have offered. I believe that it is in harmony with the best interests of commerce. I believe it will result in a better administration of the law which we are about to pass. I believe that unfair competition will be more adequately and efficiently dealt with under the procedure of my amendment than it can be under the procedure of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. There are other objections to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, but I do not pause to consider them, for they are not important in comparison with the objections I have attempted to present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the principal question presented by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] touches the review of any order which may be made by the commission. At least the essential difference between the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa and the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio concerns the matter of the review and the extent of the review of such order.

I trust, Mr. President, in the further consideration of the amendment we shall endeavor to rivet our attention upon that question, dismissing for the present, so far as we can, the much-mooted question as to whether the term "unfair competition," as used in this statute is sufficiently definite to meet the requirements of the case.

I shall be very glad to answer any inquiry that may be addressed to me in the course of the few remarks I may make by any Senator touching the particular features of these amendments, but I hope to be excused from entering into any discussion with any Senator concerning the subject of unfair competition, feeling, as I do, that that matter has been canvassed sufficiently before the Senate to afford all an opportunity to form an advised judgment.

Mr. President, to state the matter as clearly as I can, the original bill simply provides that whenever an order is made by the commission declaring a particular practice to fall within the condemnation of the statute to be unfair competition, the commission may apply to the court, in case the order is not complied with, for a process called an injunction to enforce obedience to it. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] contains the same provision, but it contains an additional provision to the effect that whenever a corporation against whom the order goes is dissatisfied with the order and desires to bring suit to annul or set it aside, that suit must be brought within a district court designated in the amendment. It is then provided and declared that the practice in such action shall be in accordance with the practice which now obtains in the case of similar suits brought to sustain or annul an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is really no substantial difference between the original bill and the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, except that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa fixes the venue within which the action can be brought to annul or suspend. There is nothing said in the original bill about an action of that character, and there is no express authority given in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to bring the action; it simply recognizes that such action may be brought. I do not regard that as essential at all, because there can be no question that the right to bring an action in the courts to annul or set aside an order of the commission exists, whether it is expressly stated in the act or not. So far as I am able to discern, there is no real material difference between the provision in this respect reported by the committee and the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], however, provides that either party to the proceedings before the commission may have a review of its decision in any district court named in the amendment; but on the review in the district court, exactly the same evidence is considered as was heard before the commission, except that either party may make a showing to the court of his inability to secure material evidence which he now offers to produce, and the court may, in its discretion, permit the additional evidence to be admitted.

It becomes a question, Mr. President, as to which of these two systems shall be pursued. I want to state, as clearly as I can, the essential difference between the two, and my reasons for believing that the review which is permitted by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio ought to be authorized by the bill.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] asked on yesterday whether it would not be wise to follow the practice and the procedure and to be governed by the precedents already established in connection with the interstate-commerce act. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, it would. It is, of course, lawyerlike that, so far as those precedents can guide us, we should follow them here.

Here let me say, Mr. President, the procedure I have indicated, which is outlined in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, follows substantially the procedure which now obtains in connection with a review of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, except in this particular, that, as pointed out now, whenever a suit is instituted for the purpose of annulling an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the question is confined to whether the constitutional rights of the party against whom the order goes have been invaded and whether there is any evidence whatever to sustain the order which has been made. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio the court will be permitted to go beyond that and reverse the order, though there is evidence which would sustain it, whenever the great weight of the evidence is contrary to the decision rendered; in other words, the difference between the two is substantially the difference between the review of a case at law upon a writ of error and the review of a case in equity upon appeal. Of course we all, as lawyers, understand that, in the first instance, the only question is whether there is any evidence to sustain the finding of the jury, while in the second case, the question is whether the judgment made is contrary to the great weight of the evidence, conceding to the judgment of the lower court in the equity case and to the commission, when its order is under review, the presumption which naturally attaches to the decision of tribunals constituted as they are respectively.

Mr. President, I am not here going to assert that if we should deny the right to a complete review of the findings of the trade commission before a court, both upon the facts and the law, the act would be unconstitutional. I greatly fear that it would be. I entertain the gravest doubt as to whether it is within our power to take away from one charged with having violated this law, with having committed what is here condemned as an unlawful act—I entertain the gravest kind of doubt as to whether you can deprive a man so charged of the right to try that question before a court constituted under the Constitution.

Mr. President, there is an essential difference between an order made by the proposed trade commission condemning certain acts already done as unlawful and prohibiting the continuance of those acts and the declaration of a rule to guide future action, such as commonly emanates from the commission whose work is so well known and commended. The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized under the law not to condemn what has been done in the past, except incidentally, but it declares a rule which is to guide in the future. The Interstate Commerce Commission says to the railroad: "In the future you can charge only such-and-such rates." That, Mr. President, is a legislative or an administrative act. A legislative or an administrative act looks to things to be done in the future. A judicial act inquires into things that have been done in the past, and either countenances or denounces them.

Let me refer you to what was said by the Supreme Court upon this matter for the purpose of making it entirely clear. I read from Interstate Commerce Commission against Cincinnati Railway Co., One hundred and sixty-seventh United States, page 499:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act; but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act.

So, likewise, Mr. President, when complaint is made that a certain practice, for instance, in the distribution of cars, is unreasonable, the Interstate Commerce Commission will find, perhaps, that it is unreasonable; but the relief that it gives looks to the future. That was the case in the opinion to which your attention has been invited in the case of the Illinois Central Railway Co. against Interstate Commerce Commission. They required the company to make a rule which should be operative in the future and which should control and guide in the distribution of cars for the future.

Mr. President, under this bill we are not going to undertake to regulate corporations and lay down rules under which they can conduct their business in the future. We have not yet determined to enter that domain.

Let me point out here that there is an essential difference between a common carrier corporation that is dealt with by the Interstate Commerce Commission and an ordinary trading corporation. Everybody recognizes that the property of the former is affected with a public use and the Government can regulate the conduct of a business in which the public interest so largely enters. We are now, however, attempting to deal with corporations whose business is not affected in any way with a public use. Our power extends to them simply because they are engaged in the business of interstate commerce. That being the case, I undertake to say, sir, that to invest a commission with the power of condemning as unlawful what has been done in the past, of adjudging that a practice which has been pursued is unfair and contrary to this law, and to issue its order prohibiting it from continuing the practice in the future, is dangerously near to authorizing this commission to perform judicial duties. If that is the case, if the duties are purely judicial, Congress can not constitutionally preclude anyone against whom the order goes from a review of the accusation against him before a constitutional court. Mr. President, when we are confronted with so doubtful a legal proposition, why should we imperil the ultimate fate of this bill, unless there are overweening considerations that impel us to withhold this power of review?

Let me state what the objections urged are. It has been suggested, in the first place, that if you give the power of general review there will be interminable delay, that the case will go to each of the successive courts, and that a final result will scarcely be attained until after a lapse of years. Why, Mr. President, let us not deceive ourselves about that. You will travel just exactly the same route; you will travel just exactly as slowly and tediously, no matter which of these systems you adopt.

Let us assume, now, that you have what is spoken of as the narrow review instead of the broad review; let us assume that you adopt the bill as it stands or that you adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, what will follow? An order is made by the commission and, no matter what you do, you can not take away from anybody the right to have that order reviewed in the court.

Whether you expressly authorize it or impliedly authorize it, as is done in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, or whether you say nothing at all about it, the man against whom that order goes has a right to go into court and ask that the order be annulled and that its enforcement be enjoined because he is deprived of his constitutional rights by reason of it. Then the district court goes on to try the case, to ascertain whether the commission acted within the scope of the law, whether it denied the constitutional rights of the party against whom the order went, whether there is any evidence to sustain the conclusion at which the commission arrived, and whether, as a matter of law, the facts shown to exist constitute unfair competition. A decree is entered sustaining the order. Under the existing law the party enjoined has the right to sue out an appeal to the circuit court of appeals and have the matter reviewed there. Then he may go to the Supreme Court of the United States and have the judgment reviewed there, because the jurisdiction rests upon a statute of the United States and not upon diversity of citizenship. So under the procedure which would be pursued on the adoption either of the amendment or the original bill the entire route can be traveled to the Supreme Court of the United States in connection with every order that is made by the commission. That is all that can be done under the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. Indeed, his amendment provides that the judgment of the circuit court of appeals shall be final, except the Supreme Court itself should deem the matter of such grave importance as that it should send down for the record by a writ of certiorari or the court below should be so troubled in arriving at a decision as to send up on a certificate a question of law for the opinion of the Supreme Court. So there is not any difference at all in the course that must be pursued, nor in the time that will be taken to get to final determination, except for the advantage indicated in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, I want to inquire for a moment what the difference is between the two methods of review. The order made by the commission with the evidence taken goes before the court in some form or other. It is simply a question as to whether the court is to be confined in its review to considering only the evidence offered to sustain the claim that the practice is unfair competition or whether it shall be permitted to inquire into the other evidence, as well that going to establish that the act complained of was not unfair competition as that making for the contrary contention. It is simply a question as to whether the court shall be entitled to review the question of the right of the order as well as the power to make it, whether the evidence is such as that a man ought to reach the conclusion that the practice is indeed unfair competition such as is denounced by the law.

I desire to say in that connection that, speaking for myself, I have no sort of apprehension with respect to what the result will be. I am not at all fearful that our courts may hurriedly and thoughtlessly reverse the judgments that may be rendered by the trade commission because the judges do not concur in the conclusions reached in conflicting evidence. I am not apprehensive in that regard; but, Mr. President, it will be borne in mind that if the order should be reversed a right of review is still given in the circuit court of appeals, and there is no reason to apprehend that that court will approve any unwarrantable interference with the work of the commission.

The courts have time and again declared that when an order is made by a special commission, constituted of men particularly fitted for the work intrusted to it, chosen because they are skilled in that particular line of work, experienced by reason of their daily vocation in the determination of such problems as are brought before them, the very greatest degree of weight and credit is to be given the orders which they make. Speaking for myself, I am not apprehensive at all that they will be lightly and inconsiderately set aside. I do not think that we have any just cause to put the fate of this bill in peril by reason of any apprehension of what may be done in that regard.

It has been suggested, Mr. President, that this amendment makes the proposed trade commission simply a gateway by which one may get into the courts, and that the commission will be like a court having power only to conduct a preliminary examination, the whole controversy being again open to review in the court above. I do not think that that is a just criticism of this amendment. It may fairly be assumed that when the trade commission decides a matter and issues its order its action will have great weight and significance with the court that is asked to vacate and annul that order. The procedure prescribed by the amendment can not justly be characterized as a mere route through which one may eventually get into the courts.

On a preliminary examination one may withhold his evidence and put it in when the defendant comes to trial in the court above. He can not do that here, however. The case is tried before the court upon the review authorized upon just exactly the same evidence as that upon which it was heard before the commission, unless, indeed, a showing is made above of newly discovered evidence or of evidence that could not have been produced upon the hearing before the commission. I believe that that provision might very properly be left out of this amendment, and yet I do not believe that it is harmful at all.

It is said, Mr. President, that corporations will take advantage of that provision and that they will withhold their testimony before the commission, and then will surprise the opposing party by making an application above and having permission to introduce it there, but, in the first place, that supposition contemplates that perjury by testifying deceitfully in the court of inability to secure the evidence offered at the trial before the commission that its existence was not known at the time of that trial, and, in the second place, it contemplates that the judge before whom the case is heard will be quite easily imposed upon by evidence of that character or will be quite ready to join in that of perverting the law. If objectionable, however, that provision of the amendment might be eliminated.

My own opinion about the matter is that it might with entire safety be left in the bill, and if experience should demonstrate that it is being used fraudulently it would be very easy in the light of that experience to amend the law later on.

Another point to which I wish to call attention is that this amendment gives a right of review to the man who makes the complaint, and it gives a right of review to the Government of the United States. You will understand that under the provision as it stands and under the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, if one complains before the commission of unfair practices pursued against him by which his business is being ruined, by which he is being wrongfully driven out of the market, and the commission decides against him, determining that the practice complained of is not unlawful, that it is not unfair competition, and dismisses his complaint, that ends the matter as to him. He can never be heard in a court at all upon his complaint. On the other hand, if the decision goes against the corporation and it is adjudged to be guilty of unfair practices in violation of the law it may have a review in the courts—true a limited review, true a review as upon a writ of error in a law case, but still a review.

Mr. President, I feel that we ought carefully to guard the rights of the party making the complaint lest at some time or other we should have a commission that has no interest in the maintenance of the law; a commission not desirous of enforcing it against the great combinations, not desirous of enforcing it against those who may sustain friendly relations with members of the commission or those influential with it. So the man who makes the complaint ought to have a right to go into court upon appeal and ask the court to adjudge whether the facts as he has brought them to the attention of the commission constitute unfair competition and whether they ought not to be suppressed by a proper order.

So, likewise, Mr. President, the amendment offered applies only to corporations. It authorizes corporations to be brought before the commission for the purpose of restraining them in the performance of acts alleged to be unlawful. Complaint is made because it does not likewise include persons, individuals, and associations. The Clayton bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee applies to all; it applies to individuals, partnerships, and corporations. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, however, is directed against corporations only. If you put the question in this way, "Why should an individual or why should a partnership be allowed to do those things which you condemn when done by a corporation?" there is no answer to be made to the question. They should not be; they should all be regarded in exactly the same light, but the fact is that we have not found any evils yet arising in our body politic by reason of any oppressive acts by one individual engaged in business against another individual engaged in business, by one partnership against another individual or another partnership or against a corporation, and this legislation, Mr. President, is intended to reach evils which we know to exist. It never was intended to reach evils which we think may possibly under some circumstances arise in the future, but of which our experience has not yet given us any warning.

In other words, as has been repeatedly said here, the evils complained of are those that are practiced by corporations, and the act is intended to reach those only.

However, it is very easy to amend this amendment by making it applicable to individuals and partnerships as well as corporations, if that should be deemed advisable. In my own humble judgment, however, we might very well abide the future with respect to that, and if in the course of time we should find evils growing up in the business system by reason of practices that have been pursued or are being pursued by individuals or partnerships, no doubt an amendment to meet that evil could be incorporated.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. JONES. Is not the declaration in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, as well as in the proposition as originally reported, "that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful," a general declaration of the unlawfulness of unfair competition whether by individuals, persons, or corporations; or does it mean "that unfair competition among corporations in commerce is hereby declared unlawful"?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly the language is general, and would apply to all of them.

Mr. JONES. It would apply to all; but the only method of enforcement that we provide applies to corporations.

Mr. WALSH. Apparently so.

Mr. JONES. Would there be, under that general declaration, a punishment that could be inflicted by the courts upon an individual practicing unfair competition? I ask that question, because I do not know whether or not we have a general law like they have in some of the States, that where an act is declared unlawful and no specific penalty is prescribed the general law fixes the penalty. In other words, would there be any penalty that could be inflicted upon an individual for practices that this language declares to be unlawful?

Mr. WALSH. I know of none.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I would suggest, however, that in that case, under this first sentence, an individual would have a right of action to recover damages against another individual for unfair competition.

Mr. JONES. That is, a civil action?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the suggestion I was about to make. While there is no way of enforcing it as a public regulation, it would characterize the quality of the act as between individuals, or as between an individual and a corporation, and it would undoubtedly give rise to personal actions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not certain that I made myself entirely clear to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in the suggestions which I made to him with reference to the difference between the functions which were conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission and those which are attempted to be conferred upon this trade commission.

As I understand, under the interstate-commerce law the reviewing power of the courts over an administrative or legislative act of the Interstate Commerce Commission does not include the power to review the facts upon conflicting evidence; and I think that is because the order of the commission is not an order in the nature of a judicial decision or a judicial decree, but is an order in the nature of an act of legislation. In that case the authority of the court very naturally should be confined to determining whether or not the order, first of all, is within the scope of the power of the commission, and whether or not it deprives the defendant of any constitutional right.

The statement made in Two hundred and twenty-second United States from which the Senator from Iowa read, at page 547, is:

> In determining these mixed questions of law and fact the court confines itself to the ultimate question as to whether the commission acted within its power. It will not consider the expediency or wisdom of the order or whether on like testimony it would have made a similar ruling. "The findings of the commission are made by law prima facie true, and this court has ascribed to them the strength due to the judgments of a tribunal appointed by law and informed by experience."

In Two hundred and fifteenth United States, in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission against The Illinois Central Railroad—which, as I remember, is the first of the series of cases which dealt with the power of the courts under the amendments of 1906—the court, after laying down the same general rule with reference to the power of the courts to review the action of the commission, went on to say what I am about to read, and I invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this language.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Two hundred and fifteenth United States, the language that I am about to read?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so. If I did not, however, I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The court went on to say:

> Plain as it is that the powers just stated are of the essence of judicial authority—

Now, those are the powers to determine whether or not the commission has proceeded within the scope of its powers, whether or not the carrier has been deprived of any constitutional right. They say:

> Plain as it is that the powers just stated are of the essense of judicial authority, and which, therefore, may not be curtailed, and whose discharge may not be by us in a proper case avoided. It is equally plain that such perennial powers lend no support whatever to the proposition that we may, under the guise of exerting judicial power, usurp merely administrative functions by setting aside a lawful administrative order upon our conception as to whether the administrative power has been wisely exercised.

So I think in all of these decisions the court was dealing with an administrative order, and not with an order that could be designated as an exercise of the judicial power.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The point the Senator is making is very interesting, of course; but in that line of cases the investigation as to whether or not there were unfair practices in the distribution of cars would be a judicial power. Then the laying down of an order, which could be done under the interstate-commerce act, providing that for two years in the future a certain plan of car distribution and car accounting should be adopted, would be a legislative power; but did not the court pass on the question of the judicial power?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. KENYON. I think it did both.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I defer to the recollection and judgment of the Senator from Iowa, because I know that he participated in that case and, I think, argued it before the Supreme Court.

Mr. KENYON. It has passed from my mind, however, as to the details of it. My remembrance is that both questions were involved.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I may answer the Senator's colleague first, here is the syllabus upon that question, at page 452:

> The act to regulate commerce has delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to consider, where a complaint is made on that subject, the question of distribution of coal cars, including the carrier's own fuel cars, in times of car shortage, as a means of prohibiting unjust preference or undue discrimination.

The order which the commission would make after such an investigation and consideration would be as to the distribution of the cars, which would be in its nature a legislative order and not a judicial decree. The purpose of making the legislative order or enacting the law, which in effect it would be, was to prevent undue preference or undue discrimination; but the order itself is legislative or administrative in character.

Mr. KENYON. There is no question about that; but, at the same time, the court condemned the practice that had existed and investigated that practice; and if that be true, then I assume the Senator would feel that that was the exercise of a judicial power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the court did not quite do that, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the senior Senator from Iowa in a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to suggest the same thing. The question was whether the Illinois Central Railroad was practicing unjust discrimination. It was doing a certain thing that was complained of; and the commission held that it was violating the law, because it was considering its own business in determining the pro rata apportionment of cars among its customers. Now, of course the commission necessarily had to enter a finding of unreasonable or unjust discrimination before it proceeded to declare rules for the future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Iowa about that. The Interstate Commerce Commission did no more in that case than the Congress itself would have done under the same circumstances. Of course Congress, before it passes a law, may investigate, may ascertain the facts, and, in a sense, may declare what the facts are; but it has no right to enter a judgment upon those facts. What it has a right to do is to pass a law in view of the facts, and that is what the Interstate Commerce Commission does. It is, in effect, to pass a law in view of the facts. So far as this line of decisions is concerned, the court, as it seems to me, very plainly distinguished between their authority to review judicial acts and mere administrative acts, because they say that their view—> lends no support whatever to the proposition that we may, under the guise of exerting judicial power, usurp merely administrative functions by setting aside a lawful administrative order upon our conception as to whether the administrative power has been wisely exercised.

I think there is a very good illustration of the distinction between the two classes of power, and therefore of the reviewing power of the courts, to be found in that part of the interstate-commerce law which authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to award damages under certain circumstances. With reference to that, the power of the court is stated in this way. I read from section 16 of the act as amended as late as 1910:

> If a carrier does not comply with an order for the payment of money within the time limit in such order, the complainant, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may file in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which he resides or in which is located the principal operating office of the carrier, or through which the road of the carrier runs, or in any State court of general jurisdiction having jurisdiction of the parties, a petition setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages, and the order of the commission in the premises.

The order of the commission therefore can not be enforced as such. An execution could not issue upon the order of the commission. If a carrier chooses to comply with it, it is a purely voluntary proceeding upon its part. If it does not choose voluntarily to comply with it, then a proceeding must be had in court.

The section I am reading proceeds:

> Such suit in the circuit court of the United States shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suit the findings and order of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the petitioner shall not be liable for costs in the circuit court nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal.

So that there is a very different power conferred upon the court in that case and in the case of purely administrative or legislative orders.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no power at all is conferred upon the court. The court exercises its original jurisdiction under the general act of Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall not quarrel with the Senator from Iowa about a refinement of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. The only thing the act does in that respect is to prescribe a rule of evidence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, if it will please the Senator better, I will say that the power of the court is not limited in the way that it is limited in dealing with purely administrative or legislative orders. The only limitation upon the power of the court, if that can be regarded as a limitation, is that the finding and order of the commission shall be regarded as prima facie evidence of the facts; but in that kind of a case the court will try the suit, will hear the evidence, and will determine after the evidence has been submitted on which side of the controversy the weight of the evidence is.

In every judicial proceeding which calls for the action of a court, the judicial power involves two things: First, to determine what the law is; second, to determine what the facts are. The determination of what the facts are in a legal proceeding is just as much the exercise of judicial power as the ascertainment and declaration of what the law it. The two things are both necessary. Now, if this be an exercise of judicial power, we can not, as it seems to me, deny ultimately to the courts the authority to discharge the power in full. If we have the right to say to the courts that a given case may be concluded by the finding of a mere administrative body upon the facts, upon what theory can we say that they shall not also be precluded from reviewing the opinions of the commission or administrative body as to the law?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. While the Senator has the interstate-commerce act there, I wish he would go back to section 15, to the question he was discussing a moment ago, with reference to the line of cases commencing with that of the Illinois Central Railroad Co. against the commission. Section 15 provides, among other things:

> Whenever * * * the commission shall be of opinion that any individual or joint rates or charges whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers subject to the provisions of this act for the transportation of persons or property or for the transmission of messages by telegraph or telephone as defined in the first section of this act, or that any individual or joint classifications, regulations, or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers subject to the provisions of this act are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act—

And so forth.

Now, if they find that, and not until they find that, they can go ahead with the order providing what individual or joint classification, regulation, or practice is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed.

What I want to get the Senator's opinion on is this: Referring to that language at the bottom of page 26, as to whether these practices are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, what kind of power is that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator must read further. To what end must the commission ascertain these facts? That is the test of whether a power is judicial or whether it is legislative. Of course a legislature has the power to ascertain a condition or to ascertain facts, to the end that it may pass legislation. An executive officer has a right to ascertain conditions and facts, to the end that the executive may perform his function. A court ascertains facts and conditions, to the end that it may discharge its judicial power. Therefore the Senator must read further and ascertain to what end is the commission authorized to ascertain the facts.

The section proceeds:

> The commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable individual or joint rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum—

And so on.

So that what the Interstate Commerce Commission does is to ascertain the facts, to the end that it may perform a legislative or administrative function, and not to the end that it may perform a judicial function, so far as that part of the law is concerned.

I think the question is analogous to that which arises in a case where we undertake to confer authority upon a justice of the peace, for example. The Constitution says that in all cases which involve $20 or more the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. Now, that means, as the courts have held, first, a jury of 12 men. It means, second, a unanimous verdict. I am not certain but that it must, in addition to that, include something that an effort is now being made to get rid of—that it means a jury instructed by the judge as to the law and advised as to the facts. However that may be, it does involve the other two things—that there must be a jury of 12 men, and that their verdict must be unanimous. That is included within the common-law notion of a jury.

We passed an act in the District of Columbia which confers jurisdiction upon a justice of the peace. I do not recall the precise language of the act in this District, but we have had such acts in various States, and therefore I will assume that it may be the same here. We passed an act, I will assume, providing that a justice of the peace shall have jurisdiction up to $300; that he may determine such cases up to that amount without a jury at all or with a jury of six men. Many of the State laws provide for a jury of six men. If we were to stop there and make that judgment final, there could be no doubt that it would be in violation of that constitutional provision, because it would deprive the parties of the right of trial by jury. The statutes go further, however, and provide that an appeal shall lie, and upon that appeal the case shall be tried de novo.

Does the Senator from Iowa think that in a case of that kind we could limit the power of the reviewing court, where the parties were entitled to a trial by jury, so as to provide that it should have no power to review the conflicting testimony? The right of the court to investigate the conflicting facts, to weigh the evidence, and to determine where the preponderance lies is of the very essence of judicial authority. I mean the court and the jury together, if it is a case where a jury may be called for; or if a case where the court sits alone, then that is the very essence of the power of the chancellor to ascertain where the preponderance of the evidence lies in a civil suit and award judgment accordingly. We could not take away that power, in the case I have supposed, by a statute which would deprive the appellant from the justice of the peace of the right to have his case completely heard both upon the law and upon the facts—upon the law by the judge who presides and upon the facts by the jury.

I think the same result would occur here if we accept the opinion of the Senator from Iowa—and I am always stating these things in view of that particular contention—that the provision declaring "unfair competition" to be unlawful has used a term which has a definite legal meaning. If it has a definite legal meaning, then the inquiry as to whether or not a corporation has violated that provision of the statute is a judicial inquiry, and its finding upon it and its order upon it is a judicial decree in substance and effect.

I do not doubt that legislation may be passed which would authorize a commission to ascertain in a preliminary way facts of that character, and to issue an order which, until it was enforced by a court, would have no enforceable effect upon anybody; that would simply be, in effect, a notice to the parties concerned that if they would comply with the order that would be the end of the matter, and that if they did not the courts would be appealed to. We do substantially that in this provision in the interstate commerce law with reference to the award of damages by the commission under certain circumstances. In that view of it, and to that extent, this trade commission is nothing more than a referee—a referee of all the courts in the country—to ascertain the facts; but now, having ascertained them and having issued its order, the vice of the original section 5 was that the courts were given no authority to try the original case, to hear the evidence, to determine where the weight of it lies, and themselves to enter the judgment. So far as the language of section 5 in the original bill is concerned, the authority of the court was purely perfunctory. If we took that language, the court would simply inquire whether or not the order had been made by the commission and whether or not it had been violated by the corporation; and if the court found those two facts, it would issue its injunction. Hence the need of providing for a review, and, as it seems to me, for providing for a complete review of these orders on the part of the court.

Now, Mr. President, for these reasons, which I have, perhaps, not very clearly stated, I intend to support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, because I think that, so far as that single question which I have heretofore raised is concerned, it rids the bill of the objection. In that single view of its unconstitutionality it renders the bill constitutional. I say nothing of the other constitutional objections which I have raised, but, I think, with that provision in the bill section 5 will no longer be open to the objection that it confers judicial power upon the commission, because under that amendment its orders amount to nothing more than good advice to the corporation, which the corporation can follow or not, as it pleases; and if it does not choose to follow it, then the courts are open and they may take hold of the entire case.

But if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa be adopted, then, if I have not misunderstood his contention, we have given to the commission not only the power to give good advice to these corporations upon the matter of law and upon constitutional rights which the courts may review, but we have conferred absolute judicial power upon the commission, so far as the facts are concerned, because we deny the right to the courts to review the facts, which, as I have already said, is as much of the essence of judicial power as the right to determine what is the law.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, while I have no special admiration for government by commission, I have no serious objections to the bill passed by the House creating a trade commission, as I think the one there provided for might serve a useful purpose in aiding the Department of Justice in investigating violations of the Sherman law, compiling facts and statistics necessary for the prosecution of such violations, and also in ascertaining whether combinations which have been adjudged unlawful have ceased their unlawful conduct and complied with the decrees of the court.

However, it is my opinion that all this is a proper matter for the Department of Justice and for the courts; and I believe that legislation which would enable the Department of Justice to prosecute violations of the antitrust laws with greater facility and vigor would be more efficient and beneficial to the country than any commission which can be created.

While I am perfectly willing to support the bill as it came from the House to the Senate, I am not in favor of the substantive law proposed to be enacted by section 5 of the bill reported as a substitute for that measure. I do not see that any material change in that respect has been made in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. I think that the proposed substantive legislation is not only vicious in a constitutional sense, but that it is arbitrary and oppressive and has potentialities of great harassment and oppression of business, especially if it is to be given the interpretation insisted upon by its friends.

The first paragraphs of section 5 of this bill are in these words:

> That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.
> The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

The subsequent paragraphs of this section provide for summary procedure to enforce those quoted, and I will call attention to them later.

There are two views of the proper interpretation of the words and phrases "unfair competition" and "unfair methods of competition in commerce" here used. The advocates of the bill, as I understand them, insist that they should be interpreted and construed by the commission and the courts to cover every possible act which may be indulged in by one competitor in commerce against another, in contesting for trade, to the prejudice of the latter. The bill, however, contains no definition of any kind of these phrases.

The other contention is that these phrases have a fixed and definite meaning in law and cover only cases where a competitor fraudulently passes off his goods and business for those of another by misrepresentation of some character. I believe the latter view to be sound, and if the paragraphs be confined to this class of wrongs, I have no objection to them.

The rule, repeatedly stated in the discussion of this question, that words and phrases which have a technical signification and those having a settled and well-known meaning at common law or by judicial decisions, when used in a statute are presumed to be used in that sense, unless the context compels to the contrary, is so well established by the textbooks and the adjudged cases that citation of authority is unnecessary. Indeed, I do not understand this rule of statutory interpretation to be controverted by anyone. When the phrases, "unfair competition in commerce" and "unfair methods of competition in commerce," are subjected to this test there is not in my mind any doubt but that the position of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that they refer solely and exclusively to cases where one dealer imposes or attempts to impose upon the public his goods or business as and for the goods or business of another by some character of fraudulent misrepresentation. The subject was given extensive consideration in a well-considered article, to be found in volume 38 of Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, from which I will read a few excerpts:

> Unfair competition consists in passing off or attempting to pass off upon the public the goods or business of one person as and for the goods or business of another. It consists essentially in the conduct of a trade or business in such a manner that there is either an express or implied representation to that effect. And it may be stated broadly that any conduct the natural and probable tendency and effect of which is to deceive the public so as to pass off the goods or business of one person as and for that of another constitutes actionable unfair competition. The definition is comprehensive enough to reach every possible means of effecting the result. Unfair competition as thus defined is a legal wrong, for which the courts afford a remedy. It is a tort and a fraud. The basic principle is that no one has a right to dress up his goods or otherwise represent them in such a manner as to deceive an intending purchaser and induce him to believe he is buying the goods of another. No monopoly is created or fostered by protection against unfair competition; but the court should be careful not to interfere with free and fair competition, and should confine itself to preventing fraud and imposition from some real resemblance in name or dress of goods. Nothing less than conduct tending to pass off one man's goods or business as that of another will constitute unfair competition. Actual or probable deception and confusion on the part of customers by reason of defendant's practices must appear. Of course there must be actual competition before there can be any unfair competition.

* * * * * * *

Relief against unfair competition is properly afforded upon the ground that one who has built up a good will and reputation for his goods or business is entitled to all the benefits therefrom. Such good will is property, and, like other property, is protected against invasion. The deception of the public injures the proprietor of the business by diverting his customers and depriving him of sales which he otherwise would have made. This, rather than protection of the public against imposition, is the true and sound basis for the private remedy, although it is often said that the remedy proceeds in part upon the theory of protection to the public against fraud. No one has a right to avail himself of another's favorable reputation in order to sell his own goods. A demand for goods created by advertising belongs to the advertiser, and he will be protected therein against unfair competition by another who seeks in any way to take advantage of such advertisement to sell his own goods.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator give the name of the author of the article?

Mr. SHIELDS. It was written by William B. Hale, Esq., of the New York bar. But the value of this article consists not in the ability and learning of the distinguished author, but the adjudged cases cited to support the text. Glancing casually over the four or five pages on which the text I have read is found, I judge that there must be four or five hundred of them. I have examined many of them, and I find that they fully support the text. Of course, I have not examined them all. This definition of unfair competition is in accord with many authorities which have been presented since the discussion of this question began.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Among the authorities which the Senator says he has examined, are there any cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. SHIELDS. There are cases from that court. On account of the great number of cases and the very concise and terse statement of the text I will not occupy the time of the Senate in reading from any of them. They are accessible to all desiring to examine them.

Mr. President, if "unfair competition in commerce" and "unfair methods of commerce" have the fixed meaning attributed to them by these authorities, when this bill comes before the courts to be construed, in the event it is enacted into law, its application will be confined to cases of the misrepresentation by false and fraudulent means of the goods of one competitor for those of another, conduct which is unlawful under the common law, and to redress injuries sustained by it the common-law remedies are ample and adequate. It seems to me folly to create this expensive commission for this one unnecessary purpose.

But, Mr. President, if these phrases, "unfair competition" and "unfair methods of competition in commerce," are to be given the interpretation which the friends of the bill say they should have, then, in my opinion, the legislation is in clear contravention of the fundamental law, uncalled-for, unwise, arbitrary, and oppressive, and I can not give it my support.

The other paragraphs of section 5, and other sections of the bill, which I will not read, clearly, in my opinion, empower the commission, whenever it may conclude that a corporation has been guilty of what the commissioners may in their uncontrolled and unconfined judgment and discretion declare to be unfair competition or unfair methods of competition, from information obtained by their agents in investigating the books, papers, and business affairs of the corporation, or the reports which they may require to be made at any time, and as often as they please, or from any other source, to prefer charges against a corporation, summon it before them to answer the charges they have preferred for conduct which they have declared unlawful, perhaps after it was committed, proceed to hear and determine its guilt or innocence, acting at the same time as prosecutor, and, if the corporation is found guilty by them, pronounce judgment against it, and, if necessary, bring a suit in the district court of the United States to enforce its judgment.

Mr. President, the provisions of this bill, in my opinion, attempt to delegate to this commission legislative, judicial, and executive powers in clear contravention of our organic law.

The powers of the Federal Government, like those of the States, are divided among three coordinate branches—the legislative, which makes the laws; the judicial, which construes, declares, and applies them; and the executive, which executes them; and the powers and prerogatives of the one can not be conferred upon or exercised by the others. This construction has long been declared and followed by the courts. It will not be controverted by anyone. The importance of maintaining this separation of powers can not be overestimated. The perpetuity of the Republic has on more than one occasion been made possible by its strict and vigorous enforcement. Concerning its importance, I wish to read a short extract from Mr. Willoughby's work on the Constitution, section 739, where he says:

A fundamental principle of American constitutional jurisprudence, accepted alike in the public law of the Federal Government and of the States, is that, so far as the requirements of efficient administration will permit, the exercise of the executive, legislative, and judicial powers are to be vested in separate and independent organs of government. The value of this principle or practice in protecting the governed from arbitrary and oppressive acts on the part of those in political authority has never been questioned since the time of autocratic royal rule in England. That the doctrine should govern the new constitutional system established in 1789 was not doubted.

Washington, in his Farewell Address, said:

"The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all governments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

Madison, in the Federalist, wrote:

"The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

John Adams wrote:

"It is by balancing one of these three powers against the other two that the efforts in human nature toward tyranny can alone be checked and restrained and any degree of freedom be preserved."

Hamilton asserted:

"I agree that there is no liberty if the powers of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers."

Webster states the same doctrine when he says:

"The separation of the departments (of government) was so far as practicable, and the preservation of the clear line between them is the fundamental idea in the creation of all our constitutions, and doubtless the continuance of regulated liberty depends upon maintaining these boundaries."

It was not necessary for me to read from Mr. Willoughby upon this subject in order to show the importance of carrying out this principle of our Government, but it could not be more strongly stated, and more eminent authorities than are there given can not be cited.

Mr. President, I believe that the powers of all three of the coordinate branches of the Government are proposed to be delegated to and vested in this commission. The commission is authorized to declare what constitutes unfair competition or unfair methods of competition, thus exercising legislative powers in creating offenses, both civil and criminal, and it also has the power to repeal such legislation by altering or vacating any order it may make in any particular case. The worst part of this legislative power, however, is that the commission is authorized to give it a retrospective effect; in other words, the commission may, after the act is done or committed for the first time, declare that such act constitutes unfair competition and a violation of law.

The commission is given judicial power by the authority to call the offender before it, to hear proof, and determine his guilt or innocence. Executive power is conferred by the authority to bring suit in the district courts of the country to enforce such orders as it may make. It is difficult for me to conceive a more pronounced and unlawful confusion and delegation of the powers of the three coordinate branches of our Government than is here attempted to be done.

The power of Congress to authorize commissions created by it and certain of the chief officials of the Government to apply and carry into effect in an administrative capacity rules and regulations previously enacted and defined, is well established and not controverted. The objection to this bill is that it, in effect, authorizes the commission created to make the laws to be administered and enforced by it. Mr. Willoughby, in the work from which I have quoted, section 759, upon this subject says:

Generally speaking, it may be said that while wide discretionary power may constitutionally be granted to administrative agents, that discretion must be one which must be guided by reason, justice, and impartiality, and must be exercised in the execution of policies predetermined by legislative act or fixed by the common law.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Yick Wo against Hopkins, in holding a municipal ordinance void, laid down the doctrine that the legislative investment of purely personal and arbitrary power in the hands of any public official is a denial of the due process of law. "The very idea," say the court, "that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails as being the essence of slavery itself."

In that case the court say:

They seem intended to confer, and actually do confer, not a discretion upon consideration of the circumstances of each case, but a naked and arbitrary power to give or withhold consent not as to places but as to persons.

It seems as if that opinion were written directly in view of the provisions of section 5 of this bill.

There are cases in which commissions of this kind have been vested with what apparently seems to be legislative and judicial powers. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the most notable instance of the kind. It is difficult to reconcile it with the constitutional division of the powers of the Government and also of the constitutional limitations of the power of the Congress to delegate its legislative power. It perhaps was thought to be justified by the necessities of the case, which, however, should never justify the violation of the fundamental law.

The Government has always exercised control over common carriers and regulated their charges and rates perhaps to a greater extent than it has done of any other private interest.

The number and the magnitude of the power of the railroad companies of this country demanded greater governmental control than common carriers had had in past years, which could not be exercised in any other way than by an administrative commission because of the vast, varied, and complicated details to be considered and the continuous investigation and oversight required. What weight was given these considerations in the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the courts in sustaining it I do not know. I will not undertake to go into the questions that have been presented in the construction of this statute at this time.

Generally speaking, I venture the assertion that in every case involving the powers conferred on commissions and departmental officers it will be found that they extend no further than the authority to administer and apply laws previously enacted by Congress, and that in no case will be found an unmixed delegation of legislative power.

The Lottery cases, which have been so often referred to in this discussion as sustaining the proposition to vest judicial and legislative power in the proposed trade commission, are authority just to the contrary. There Congress, by express enactment, prohibited the transportation through the mails of letters or other papers for the purpose of carrying on a lottery, as well as certain other mail deemed hurtful to public morals and the general welfare, and gave the Postmaster General power to exclude it. Here the prohibition and the offense are declared and defined by the Legislature in fixed terms, and the power vested in the Postmaster General is merely administrative.

The difference between that law and this bill is unmistakable. If the act of Congress prohibiting the use of the mails by lotteries had merely declared that the Postmaster General might exclude objectionable matter, or couched the prohibition and authority in some other general terms, and authorized the Postmaster General to determine and declare what character of mail should be considered objectionable, the law would have been void and unenforceable because a delegation of legislative power.

As the most flagrant violation of the fundamental law in section 5 is the delegation of legislative powers to the commission to create new offenses and new causes of action, restrain freedom of contract and property rights of citizens, I will read what Judge Cooley says in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 163:

> One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws can not be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain, and by that constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been entrusted can not relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be developed, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

Mr. President, the phrases "unfair competition" and "unfair methods of competition in commerce," other than as stated in the authorities which I have read at length, are wholly undefined by the common and the statute laws of this country. They are not defined even in the bill, wherein conduct supposed to be covered by them is proposed to be made unlawful. In fact, these phrases, as now proposed to be used and left to the interpretation of the commission created for the enforcement of the offenses, causes of action, and prohibitions understood to be denounced by them, are wholly new in our jurisprudence. They are here used without definition and without limitation of their application.

Who, whether he be lawyer or layman, can undertake to say what is "unfair competition" or "unfair methods of competition," or what the commission proposed to be authorized to enforce the law will declare the statute to mean? The language is so vague and so general that it can not be said to mean anything in a legal sense. It is nothing more than a general power to the commission to declare what shall be the law. This is an unmixed as well as an unwarranted delegation of the legislative power. If the bill is to be given the interpretation and effect of its advocates, it creates new criminal offenses and causes of civil action. It is a general rule that all acts denounced as unlawful by statute, without more, are misdemeanors. Whether this applies to the criminal jurisprudence of the Federal Government I am not clear, for I have not investigated it, but it is a general principle of universal application in the States. I do not, however, believe that it would be held valid as a criminal statute because of its vagueness.

When the legislature creates an offense which was not one at common law the statute must be sufficiently certain to show what was intended to be prohibited and punished, otherwise it is void for uncertainty. In the case of the State v. Mann (2 Oreg., 238) it is said:

> It is a well-settled rule of law that no one can be punished for doing an act unless it clearly appears that the act sought to be punished comes clearly within both the spirit and letter of the law prohibiting it. The act constituting the offense should be clearly and specially described in the statute, and with sufficient certainty at least to enable the court to determine, from the words used in the statute, whether the act charged in the indictment comes within the prohibition of the law.

A Texas statute purporting to prescribe a punishment for "murder by mob violence" was held void for uncertainty in the case of Augustine v. State (41 Texas Criminal). That was more certain in its terms than this bill. Who can know when he reads this law what conduct he must refrain from to keep out of jail?

There can be no question but that it will create a multitude of causes of action for damages if given the broad meaning proposed. When a statute declares a thing to be unlawful, those who sustain injuries the natural and proximate effect of a violation of the law may recover damages therefor against the wrongdoer. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has offered an amendment creating such a cause of action, but it is unnecessary. It is already the law.

Now, we have here a statute declaring all unfair competition and all unfair methods of competition unlawful. We have no definition of these words in the act.

What business man will know how to conduct himself under these conditions? It is impossible for him to get advice from his lawyer how to conduct his business, for there are no authorities, there are no law books, which lay down or state the law upon the subject which they can consult. The whole thing is at sea and is left to the determination of this commission after the act is committed.

This is a most serious objection to this proposed law. To my mind there can be no greater embarrassment to the people of any country than the uncertainty of the laws which govern them. The bill should not pass without an amendment defining with reasonable certainty what conduct it is intended to prohibit.

It has been said that the words are equally as definite as "restraint of trade" and "monopoly." I do not think that position can be maintained. The words and phrases "restraint of trade" and "monopoly" have for more than a century had well-defined, fixed, definite meanings in our jurisprudence. There are hundreds of cases to be found in the English reports and in the reports of all the courts of this country, State and Federal, involving restraint of trade and monopoly under the common law. They are there used and defined and applied, and any lawyer, by ordinary industry, can ascertain what conduct or act comes within them.

The Supreme Court had no trouble in applying the Sherman law after it construed these words to be therein used in their common-law sense, for that was well defined in the books and known to all lawyers and most business men.

An ordinary illustration of restraint of trade can be found in cases involving the sale in usual and normal business of the stock of goods and the good will of the concern, with a contract upon the part of the vendor that he will not engage in the same business at the same place within a limited time, by one competing merchant to another. Such contracts have always been held to be valid because the tendency to restraint of trade and competition is not unreasonable and the transaction not detrimental to the public. Innumerable cases of this character in which the phrases are used are found in all reports of judicial decisions.

It has also been said the phrases "unfair competition" and "unfair methods of competition" convey a meaning as definite and as well known as the words "fraud" and "fraudulent." That is a mistake. There are no words known to our laws which have been more frequently and accurately defined and applied. There is no uncertainty in their meaning, the sole difficulty being in their application to the facts of each particular case. I will read from volume 20 of Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, pages 8 and 12, where these words are defined:

> Fraud as a generic term, especially as the word is used in courts of equity, properly includes all acts, omissions, and concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust, or confidence, justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue and unconscientious advantage is taken of another.

* * * * * * *

While the rules governing the essential elements of actionable fraud are in the main well settled, the distinctions drawn in particular cases are, however, often very fine, in many instances it being practically impossible to reconcile or distinguish decisions based on very similar states of fact; and this difficulty has been frankly conceded by the courts.

The general rule is that to constitute actionable fraud it must appear: (1) That defendant made a material representation; (2) that it was false; (3) that when he made it he knew that it was false, or made it recklessly without any knowledge of its truth and as a positive assertion; (4) that he made it with the intention that it should be acted upon by plaintiff; (5) that plaintiff acted in reliance upon it; and (6) that he thereby suffered injury. Each of these facts must be proved with a reasonable degree of certainty, and all of them must be found to exist; the absence of any one of them is fatal to a recovery. A maxim announced in an early English case and ever since recognized as correct is that fraud without damage or damage without fraud is not actionable, but that where both concur an action of deceit will lie.

Mr. President, if we could find in the books as clear a definition as this of unfair competition in commerce or of unfair methods of competition, we would have no trouble in administering this proposed law; lawyers would have no trouble in advising their clients what conduct and what character of competition they could indulge in and in what they could not; the business men of the country would know when they were subjecting themselves to a civil action; but it is frankly admitted here upon the floor that there is no such definition to be found in the textbooks or in the reported cases. No one has been able to give a definition that anything like approaches that of fraud, although the two are somewhat analogous of "unfair competition" in the sense in which I understand this phrase is undertaken to be used by the friends of this bill. It seems to me if this bill is enacted and this restricted construction is not given to it that we have created an engine of oppression and not enacted a law for the protection or advancement of the commerce of the country. The wrong, the evil, the injury to the public which the rules of the common law, the Sherman anti-trust law, and all laws of the character we are considering are intended to prevent and to remedy, is the creation of private monopolies and the monopolization of commerce. While monopoly in its original sense meant a grant of the exclusive right to pursue some vocation, or deal in some article of prime necessity of commerce, it is now applied to all cases where persons or corporations obtain by any means the exclusive or partial control of commerce. The injury to the public is the tendency and effect of such control to limit production, deteriorate quality, and control prices, which do or may result in oppression and extortion, to the detriment of the public.

Contracts in restraint of trade which tend to create or do create monopolies are unlawful under the common law. The first section of the Sherman law is declaratory of the common law upon this subject as applicable to interstate commerce and imposes a severe penalty upon all those who make such contracts. It is clear from a reading of this section that it only applies to restraints of trade effected by contract, which includes combinations, trusts, and conspiracies.

The second section is declaratory of the common law concerning monopolies and attempts to monopolize commerce, and also makes the creation of such monopolies criminal and prescribes a punishment.

The criminal part of both sections is new and was unknown to the common law. There is nothing in either section concerning fraudulent or tortious acts unless such acts can be said to be included in the prohibition of monopolies and attempts to monopolize commerce. The civil remedies unknown to the common law provided by the act are a suit in equity by the United States to enjoin and prohibit restraints of commerce and monopolies and an action by the aggrieved party or parties to recover threefold damages for the injuries sustained from the unlawful act committed.

The object of section 5 of the bill, as I understand it, is to go further and make unlawful and prohibit fraudulent or tortious acts committed by corporations whereby a competitor in the same business is injured, and this regardless of the fact whether the wrongful act prohibited tends to monopoly and detriment to the public. Certainly there is nothing in the bill indicating that in order to be unlawful the injury must be one to the public.

If enacted, this legislation must be under what is known as the police power. While, generally speaking, the Congress can not exercise the police power, it not being one of the enumerated powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, but an inherent, governmental function reserved to the States, it may establish police regulations, confining their operations to the subjects over which it is given control by the Constitution. Therefore it may exercise such police power as is necessary to regulate and protect interstate commerce. It is not insisted that this legislation has any connection with any other of the enumerated powers of the Federal Government other than that to regulate commerce, and it must be a regulation of that kind in order to be sustained.

The police power is a very broad one, and it is difficult to define its limitations. The Government, in the exercise of it, may to some extent invade and limit the constitutional rights of the citizen. It may restrain his personal liberty, his freedom of contract, and his control of his property and property rights when necessary to promote the public interest or the general welfare, but it can not do any of these things to advance or protect private interests.

I read again from Willoughby on the Constitution, section 726:

Though, as we have seen, there are necessarily many circumstances under which the political power, in behalf of the public interest, may interfere with the freedom of action of the individual and the use by him of his own property, in no one of these cases may this interference be an arbitrary one; that is to say, in each case the propriety of the interference may be questioned by the individual, and when so questioned the official whose act constitutes the interference must be able to justify his act by referring to a valid law and to some consideration of public necessity or convenience.

* * * * * * *

If a contract formerly valid is refused enforcement it must be shown to be opposed to public policy. If property is taken under eminent domain, it must be for public use and compensation must be given. If the rates charged by public-service corporations are regulated by law, the regulation must be a reasonable one and not one, in its effect, confiscatory of private property. Finally, to constitute a valid exercise of the so-called police power of the State, there must be shown some public advantage to be gained by thus interfering with the personal liberty and property rights of the individual.

The law is stated in the same terms, in effect, by Mr. Freund in his work on police powers, at section 494, and numerous decisions of both the Federal and State courts.

The principle is analogous to that in the power of eminent domain, which, indeed, is sometimes said to come under the police power; that is, that private property can only be taken for the public use.

The police power extends not only to the commission of fraud upon the public in commerce, but to measures for the prevention of the consummation of such frauds.

Mr. Tiedeman, in his work on Limitations of Police Power, says:

Fraud is, of course, a trespass upon another's private rights and can always be punished when committed. It is therefore but rational to suppose that the State may institute every reasonable preventive remedy when the frequency of the frauds or the difficulty experienced in circumventing them is so great that no other means will prove efficacious. Where, therefore, police regulations are established which give to private parties increased facilities for detecting and preventing fraud, as a general proposition these laws are free from all constitutional objections.

Mr. Freund, in his work on police power, section 275, in treating of this character of legislation, says:

The private and the criminal law, as well as the police power, undertake to afford protection against fraud. They deal, however, with fraudulent practices only by remedial relief, treating a transaction as void or setting it aside, giving a claim for damages or inflicting a penalty after the fraud has been committed. In either case the element of fraudulent intent is essential. The police power undertakes to give an ampler protection both by adopting precautionary measures and by forbidding certain practices, irrespective of an actual intent to defraud. It does not in the first instance punish fraud, but prescribes regulations and punishes their violation. The intervention of the law proceeds upon the theory that everyone who invites the confidence of the public may be compelled to submit to such regulations as will guard the public as far as possible against misapprehension. Where the confidence of the public is invited to an exceptional degree the regulations may be made especially stringent, on the ground that the business is affected with a public interest.

In People v. Lurhs (195 N. Y.) it is said:

The enactment of statutes to prevent fraud is a proper exercise of the police power of the State, which is under the control of the legislature. The power to pass laws upon the subject necessarily carries with it the choice of methods to make the legislation effective. The right is not without limitation, for it must be exercised so as not to deprive a citizen of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or to deny any person the equal protection of the laws. A reasonable regulation to protect the rights of all, however, does not deprive anyone of his property, simply because it intereferes with the use thereof to the extent necessary to protect the public from fraudulent practices. Legislation which interferes only to a reasonable extent with the enjoyment of property in order to promote the general welfare, and which, in fact, tends to promote the general welfare, violates neither constitution.

All these authorities predicate the right to exercise the police power for the prevention and prohibition of wrongs of this character upon the ground of public necessity, and it can not be exercised in any other case.

This is an attempt to enact a police regulation for the prevention of fraudulent practices by competitors in commerce.

The interest or welfare of the general public, the consumers, is not benefited, or certainly only to a very slight degree, and that in a very indirect and remote manner that is a possible destruction of competition which might result in monopoly.

Considering the legislation in this light, there may well be entertained serious doubt of its constitutionality as a valid police measure for the regulation of interstate commerce. It is very doubtful whether its provisions relate to any public interest or to interstate commerce. Certainly the vague terms of the provisions of the bill open the door for the exercise of the power in cases to which it can not constitutionally apply. It is almost impossible to conceive that a commission will be able to discriminate between practices which merely affect the interests of the parties concerned and those which are detrimental to the general public. It is almost certain that an attempt of a commission to execute this law will lead to the greatest confusion in the business world.

What appears and appeals to the judgment of one man as being unfair in striving for business, which constitutes competition, often seems to another perfectly legitimate. There are methods of competition which some men consider unfair, and they may be so in an ethical sense, but which are clearly within the rights of the citizen and can not be restrained. An illustration of this is presented in the case of Chicago against Netcher, reported in One hundred and eighty-third Illinois, page 104, which involved the validity of an ordinance of the city of Chicago prohibiting the sale of groceries and liquors in a department store. This ordinance was passed, evidently, in the interest of the ordinary retail dealer in groceries and liquors, a substantial class and number of the inhabitants of the city, and was clearly calculated to protect and promote their private interests. The Supreme Court of Illinois, however, held, and correctly held, that no public interest was involved and that the ordinance was void as an invasion of the personal liberty and property rights of the owners of department stores.

Among other things, the court said:

> In order to sustain legislative interference with the business of the citizen by virtue of the police power, it is necessary that the act should have some reasonable relation to the subjects included in such power. If it is claimed that the statute or ordinance is referable to the police power, the court must be able to see that it tends, in some degree, toward the prevention of offenses or the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare. It must be apparent that some such end is the one actually intended, and that there is some connection between the provisions of the law and such purpose. If it is manifest that the statute or ordinance has no such object, but, under the guise of a police regulation, is an invasion of the property rights of the individual, it is the duty of the court to declare it void.

The power attempted to be exercised, then, must always have a reasonable relation to the public interest. It must not be for a private interest, and when exercised by Congress under the commerce clause it must have a reasonable bearing upon interstate commerce for its protection and regulation. Can this act stand this test?

When a commission, if appointed, comes to construe this statute, how many men can be found to discriminate between practices or methods of competition which relate solely to intrastate commerce and those which relate to interstate commerce? How difficult it will be to determine whether the practice or conduct complained of is confined merely to the prejudice of a dealer and not to that of the general public! It is true that in all cases these interests are somewhat commingled, but in many they are distinct and independent of each other. If, however, we create this commission, acting as they must without any guide, without any definition of "unfair competition" in the books or in this statute, I venture to say that in a majority of cases in which they act and which may be appealed or transferred to the courts for further decision, if the procedure proposed in the fifth section is adopted, we will find that they have exceeded their jurisdiction and powers.

This illustrates the impracticability of executing the authority vested in this commission in this indefinite and vague way. If this bill, enacted into law, will subserve the public interest and affect interstate commerce to such a material extent as to save it from constitutional objections, it is without doubt upon the border line, and its limitations should be carefully guarded. There should be some practicable, some workable definition of "unfair competition" placed in it. There should be some limitation on the powers of the commission.

So far as the rights of the dealers are concerned, there is no necessity for this legislation. The State laws furnish ample remedies for all possible wrongs growing out of fraudulent acts.

The delegation of the police power must always be definite, or so that it can be made so. The most common and usual delegation of this power is to municipalities, which is proper, as they are but arms of the State, necessary for efficient local government. The legislature, however, can not delegate the power to municipalities in the general manner here attempted to be given a mere commission. It can not give a municipality the unlimited power to create and punish offenses. The power can only be delegated to cities and towns to pass ordinances making all offenses under the laws of the State offenses against the municipality. Thus the legislature may authorize a municipality to declare and abate nuisances; but this does not carry with it the power to create a nuisance not known to the laws of the State. Certainly these limitations upon the delegation of legislative power ought not to be less rigid when it is delegated to a mere commission, if, indeed, this can be constitutionally done. The provisions of the bill merely declare a general policy. They refer to no fraudulent practices known and defined by the common or the statute law. They leave it to the commission, in the exercise of their arbitrary and, it may be, capricious judgment, to determine what is and what is not unfair competition and unfair methods of competition in commerce after the thing is done, and then to summon before them the offender, hear the charges they have preferred, and enter up an order of condemnation; and having done this, proceed to institute a suit in court to execute the judgment they have rendered under the retrospective law they have made. Certainly the policy and righteousness of such a law can not well be defended, even if warrant can be found for it in the Constitution.

This bill, as I understand it, is administrative and remedial in its nature, and it seems to me that it would be more orderly legislation not to embrace in it any substantive law of the kind under consideration. I think it will result in confusion to the country to do so. The Clayton bill, which will be enacted into law by the present Congress, is intended, as it purports in its title, to supplement the Sherman law. I think that is the bill where all substantive law of this kind should find a place. I offered an amendment to that bill some weeks ago that I think should be adopted, and I propose to press it when the Senate comes to consider the bill. That amendment is in these words:

> That all contracts, agreements, arrangements, acts, and fraudulent practices which tend, separately or with one or more other transactions for like purposes, to lessen competition in commerce, or restrain or monopolize commerce, or which may form a material part of a conspiracy or combination to restrain or monopolize commerce contrary to the provisions of the antitrust acts, and made or carried on with that intent, are hereby declared unlawful and are prohibited.

This is a statement of a proposition of generic law. It seems to me it would be a valuable supplement to the Sherman law. It is preventive in its nature. It provides for the prevention of all preliminary steps that may lead up to the consummation of the acts forbidden and prohibited by the Sherman law. It prohibits the first step in restraints of commerce, in contracts, combinations, and trusts, for that purpose. It prohibits all fraudulent methods used for that purpose. It prohibits attempts at monopolization of commerce. It prohibits all those things which finally result in monopoly.

If such a provision should be incorporated in this bill, it certainly would make it much plainer, much more practicable and workable, and would certainly create less embarrassment to the country; and I believe it would relieve the act of some of the constitutional objections that have been urged against it.

While I think that a commission with reasonable powers of investigation may aid the Department of Justice in the enforcement of the antitrust laws, I think it should be subservient to that department, and in no way and to no extent supersede it or oust it of its legitimate place and powers. I believe, however, that a law authorizing the Attorney General to appoint a corps of competent lawyers, to be paid salaries that would command able men, and a liberal appropriation to defray the expenses, would be more efficient in the suppression of trusts and monopolies than any commission that can be devised. It would certainly be less expensive. It is estimated that to carry out the provisions of this bill it would require a force of two or three thousand men, with salaries of from two to three thousand dollars each, which alone would call for an expenditure of $6,000,000 annually, which I think is excessive. But take one-third of this—$2,000,000. For that sum the Department of Justice could be so aided that there would be no doubt about the enforcement of all these laws. That is the practical and economic way to effect our purposes.

I also agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] in his strictures upon the sections of the bill authorizing drastic search and oppressive inquisition into the private affairs of the people, and requiring them, under heavy penalties, to make constant reports of their private affairs, and to preserve every paper and memorandum used by them in their business, without limit as to character or the period covered. I can add nothing to the criticism so forcefully made by him upon these sections. These provisions, it seems to me, are proposed to be enacted upon the theory that the business men of this country are all engaged in fraudulent practices and conspiracies against their fellow men.

I do not believe this. The presumption of law is that all men are honest and obey the laws of their country, and not that they are dishonest and criminals. The presumption of innocence stands as a witness for the accused, and the burden is upon the Government to prove guilt. Have our business men a lower standing than criminals at the bar of justice? I am unwilling to support any law that casts such an unjust reflection upon the hundreds of thousands of citizens of this country engaged in commerce, and who have contributed so much to the development and building up of the greatest Nation of the world.

It is estimated that there are 160,000 corporations that will be subject to the powers of this commission which have annually, in the aggregate, net earnings of not less than $3,000,000,000 and have in their service, at a conservative estimate, not less than 8,000,000 people. The stockholders in these several corporations also number hundreds of thousands, perhaps more than a million. Many of them have the savings of a lifetime so invested. These stockholders and employees are directly interested in the prosperity of these corporations, and whatever embarrasses the corporations embarrasses them. This to some extent indicates the far-reaching effects of this legislation, the great number of people affected, and the tremendous powers of good or evil that are proposed to be vested in five men sitting here in Washington.

The jurisdiction of the commission, in my opinion, should be limited to corporations having exceeding $500,000 capital stock. It is only great and powerful corporations that restrain trade and monopolize commerce. The small corporations of less capital than that stated have not the power, and in few instances the disposition to do so, and, in addition, they can easily be controlled by the laws of the several States where they are located. Every State in the Union, in addition to the common law there in force, has enacted ample legislation for this purpose. I do not believe that, because certain great corporations have monopolized the commerce of the country and oppressed the people, the Government should presume that all others are guilty of like offenses and compel them to prove their innocence and otherwise embarrass and oppress them with regulation, espionage, and surveillance heretofore unknown in a free country.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have stated, I think the first paragraphs of section 5 to be in contravention of the organic law; but even if they were constitutional I would not be able to give them my support, because I think more opportunity for embarrassment of the business of this country is to be found in the power here vested than in any legislation that has ever been proposed. The powers vested in a commission of this kind ought to be distinctly defined. The corporations that the commission will have jurisdiction over ought to be limited to those that are a menace to the country. There is no possible reason for causing every little corporation, from $5,000 in capital stock up, to make the reports here required, or for subjecting them to visitation by the employees, emissaries, and spies of this commission. The small corporations as well as the large ones do interstate business. They can ill bear such expense. Their property and business belongs to their stockholders, and ought not to be destroyed in this way.

There is another serious consideration. Whenever it is known in the neighborhood of these corporations that the Federal trade commission has one of its agents going through their papers and books investigating their affairs, a cloud is immediately cast upon their credit, and their business and property injured. This ought not to be done. Your antitrust laws can be enforced and monopoly restrained and destroyed without such drastic measures, and it is against the interest of the people to enact them into law.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in order to consider the pending bill we have to consider the Sherman antitrust law, which, of course, is based upon and presupposes that there is that element of human nature against which organized society in the form of government has to protect itself.

The Sherman antitrust law, so far as the creation of the law was concerned, came at a very opportune time. It came at a time when there was little of bitterness, resentment, rancor, or popular hysteria in the situation. Men were in a position calmly to see that there was a condition which needed legislation. The great combinations had not then developed, and their power and influence did not have to be encountered by the legislative branch of the Government.

On the other hand, the great combinations then not having developed, there was but little resentment on the part of the people; and it would be perhaps difficult to find a time in the history of our country when the legislative thought was so free and untrammeled and had so complete an opportunity to develop itself along natural lines as at the time of the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law. Thus framed in a spirit of calmness and due deliberation, free from those influences calculated to interfere with the exercise of legislative judgment, the law was a splendid tribute to the skill and patriotism of those who enacted it.

Unfortunately, however, while the law was passed at a most opportune time, with reference to its framing, it came at a most inopportune time for a test of the law itself. The law had scarcely been enacted when we entered upon a great industrial panic, a period of intense depression; and during that period of depression, which lasted several years, there was, of course, no thought along the line of repressing, controlling, or regulating.

When the American people began to emerge from that great period of financial and industrial distress they had but one thought before them, and that was the restoration of our industrial and commercial activities. That was supplemented by the fact that about that time we engaged in the Spanish War, which also took our attention from these internal conditions. Under those circumstances, when the mind of the people was diverted along the line of developing activities rather than controlling them, and when the public mind was diverted by a foreign war, great combinations were growing up.

I do not think it is any reflection upon any administration. I do not know just where an analysis of that history would lay the most blame, if blame is to be laid upon anyone, for the failure to enforce the Sherman antitrust law through those years was largely due to the conditions I have referred to. Administrations, of course, in the long run only reflect public sentiment, and public sentiment during those years was not directed toward the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law. So that when we began to discover, as we resumed our more normal industrial life, that these great combinations had grown up in the very shadow of the Sherman antitrust law, many were disposed to condemn the law as inefficient and not a sufficient weapon to prevent the growth and development of these combinations.

Along with that condition of affairs came the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission, fortunately, was made up, in the main, of very high-class men; and that commission, as a rule, had to deal with acute conditions. A rate is something that everybody can comprehend. The difference between a dollar per thousandweight and a dollar and a half per thousandweight presents no twilight zone of doubt and uncertainty. It is an acute fact, that is easily grasped by the mind of everyone.

Dealing with that kind of a problem, and in the manner in which the Interstate Commerce Commission dealt with it, it was natural that the Interstate Commerce Commission came in time to hold a very strong place in the confidence, esteem, and respect of the American people. Failing to discriminate between the action of a commission that was thus dealing with an acute fact, which everyone could comprehend, and other commissions, there grew up in this country unquestionably a general sentiment in favor of commissions, and we have had commissions galore. Yet it is a sad commentary upon Congress, and I might say upon the sentiment back of Congress, that in that growth and development of a sentiment for a commission we have failed up to this time to secure a commission in the one function where a commission would well serve the public, and that would be in taking tariff schedules out of the haphazard of legislative mishaps and legislative log rolling, although for a number of years a large number of us worked in season and out of season to secure a tariff commission.

Meantime, however, the suggestion of a trade commission came to the American people, and, influenced by the success of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the confidence which that commission had inspired in the people, this thought of a trade commission grew with great force and rapidity. The present chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate [Mr. NEWLANDS] at all times was active, earnest, and insistent for the establishment of a trade commission. Pursuant to that thought and that purpose, a bill coming over from the House and coming before the committee of the Senate was finally reported out.

I do not think there is a man in this Chamber who is more fair at heart than the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, but time and again during the last three or four weeks the Senator from Nevada has insisted that this is a matter that has been in the public mind until the American public is thoroughly in favor of this commission. The American public could not have known up to a short time ago of the one section of this bill that alone gives the bill vitality. I refer, of course, to section 5.

Without section 5 this trade commission bill is little more than a codification of laws, every one of which can be found somewhere in the Federal statutes, except the one provision which authorizes the court to refer to this commission as to a master in chancery. Of course, that provision was in no statute, because up to this time the trade commission has not been named in any statute, but the other powers, the powers of visitation, the powers of investigation, are in various officials of this country, and about all there is of this trade commission bill up to section 5 is a codification of existing law and the creation of an expensive, top-heavy commission.

Section 5 as reported by the Senate committee was practically a reprint of the bill introduced in the House by Congressman STEVENS of New Hampshire. The Senate committee met one afternoon. I was there with the committee and we voted to report section 5 out, not with consideration. Among others I voted to report it out, simply because I did not believe that Senate or House committees should be catacombs in which proposed legislation lies buried. I believe that proposed legislation should come out and that the Senate should discuss it in the open forum. Therefore, for one I was anxious to have that amendment brought out. It was brought out without consideration. The country could not have known of it.

The trouble with the Senator from Nevada is this: For years he has believed that a trade commission should have the power to pass upon whether acts were within law or without law, and he has urged that so long and it has been in his mind so associated with the thought of a trade commission that I can readily understand that a public demand for some kind of legislation became associated in his mind with a commission having power to declare what is lawful and what is not lawful; that is, he naturally accepted the public approval of a commission with his own idea of what a commission should be.

At this point we discover a singular condition with reference to this amendment. When the amendment came before the Senate, I think almost every Senator believed that it was the attempt to confer upon the commission power to legislate.

I remember one afternoon the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]—and probably there is no man in this body more competent to pass upon such a question—in response to an inquiry from me as to whether the commission under section 5 could permit or prohibit what is called local underselling, answered that that power would be vested in the commission and that there was given the commission the power to say what should be the law and what should not be the law—an exercise of legislative power.

But in the last few days, sitting here and noting the drift of the discussion, I find that there is a gradual drawing back from that, and that now the prevailing thought seems to be that the only thing which the commission can do with reference to this clause in regard to unfair competition is simply to make a declaration, and that declaration has force only so far as it may comport with the facts, the circumstances, and the general acceptance of what is unfair competition.

For one I have had no difficulty in dealing with the expression "unfair competition." I differ in that respect from my friend from Missouri [Mr. REED] and some of the other Senators. I think it is as plain a designation as the designation of unreasonable rates or the designation of acts in restraint of trade.

Here we stand at the threshold of what I regard as the most vital change proposed in the policy of this Government. If there is any force in section 5, if it is worth our while to spend the time and use the paper upon which section 5 is printed, it is a departure from the policy of the past.

The language of some of the arguments, the language of the President's message, I think clearly foreshadows that while we do not put it in express terms in section 5, it is the thought and purpose that under section 5 the commission shall take "big business" by the arm and carry on a personally conducted excursion into the doubtful realms of forbidden transactions. I will read from the President's message of last February and from his speech of two years ago, and let me say I do it not to develop any suggestion of reflection upon the President or anyone else. I am reading this to interpret by the force which an administration utterance has as to the real purpose of this bill, and I shall read another address to illustrate what I believe is a fundamental, sound proposition in regard to government. In his message he says:

Nothing daunts or discourages—

Speaking of business—

Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of failing under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed.

The Senator from Nevada, every time this proposed bill has been criticized, has met the criticism by the suggestion that whoever criticizes the measure should offer something in the place of it. I propose before this contest is over to offer an amendment in spirit with the declaration of the President:

Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed.

Fortunately following that discussion of the question we have this interwoven:

These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

If the President had paused there there would have been no question as to what his purpose was, but he adds, and he seems to add with approval:

And the business men—

For it is connected with "and"—

And the business men of the country desire something more than that the menace of legal process in these matters be made explicit and intelligible. They desire the advice, the definite guidance and information which can be supplied by an administrative body, an interstate trade commission.

There is no way in which "definite guidance" can be given save at the hands of some power clothed with the authority to make that guidance definite. The lawyer in his office in Wall Street can not give "definite guidance." He may with his long experience and vast research give views that it is safe perhaps to follow, but it is only the man clothed with the power of supplementing his guidance by a declaration of what is or is not the law who can give "definite guidance."

These two paragraphs are somewhat confusing. So I am inclined to think that back of the language of this bill, while it is not in express terms, it is only as we analyze the bill and see what the power is, how it is to be exercised and how controlled, we find the warrant for the suggestion that there lies the purpose that this trade commission shall in some way give "definite guidance." In other words, be in a position to say what is law and what is not law, and I feel that this is a fair deduction from the manner in which the authority is conferred, especially in the light of the Executive declaration which I have quoted.

If that is intended, then I repeat we stand at the threshold of a change the most vital and important in the history of this country. If Congress is to absolutely take the power and authority and function of legislation and turn it over to a handful of men, five or seven in number, and practically place their judgment beyond recall by the great lawmaking power of this country, theoretically at least, then we certainly stand at the threshold of a most remarkable change in the fundamental plan of government.

It may be that in dealing with this subject, where the work is largely subterranean, where the methods are hidden and concealed, we have reached the point where Congress must thus abdicate the lawmaking function and turn it over to a commission. If we have, then of course it should be done, but I, for one, contemplate it with reluctance and hesitation. I may vote for the bill—it may be improved before the final vote—but I certainly hesitate to place the lawmaking and law-enforcing power in a position so fraught with danger, so liable to become the instrument of that very spirit which we are seeking to control and regulate.

Law has to be framed not with reference to the character of the man who to-day is to administer the law, but law has to be framed in the face of the fact that every policy and purpose and activity in free Government has to be wrought out of that sphere of humanity that at one extreme embraces the worst and at the other extreme embraces the best. We have to frame laws not with reference to the character of this President or that President, or possibly this commission or that commission, but we have to frame them with reference to the broad law of human nature that has its average of equation of good, bad, and indifferent in human nature.

In coming over the gulf that separates monarchy from the republic we brought with us that old tradition born of centuries of monarchical government that somehow, somewhere in government there is something that is somewhat above and beyond the human. Man has been slow to get away from that old tradition. In crossing that gulf we brought that tradition in a measure with us, and we took that tradition and enveloped the judiciary in it. It was well that we did, although that tradition is hostile to the fundamental spirit of democracy.

The consequence has been that the judiciary has been especially immune from the approach of sinister force and purpose. Many a man who would go to a President, a governor, a Representative, or Senator, without any thought that he was transgressing any rule of propriety, hesitates to approach a judge on the same subject, and our judiciary has been unusually exempt from those forces which have constantly surrounded other functions of our official life.

Not only that, but that tradition has had its influence upon the mind of the judge himself. There is not a Senator who has practiced law but knows, in his experience, that men of ordinary ideals elevated to the position of judge have suddenly developed a higher ideal, and between those two forces, the one protecting the other, inspiring the judiciary, our judiciary has been relieved from much of the force that surrounds men in other walks of official life.

But there is no such protection to a commission, and we can not afford to recognize a change in our fundamental theory of law where we may expect at the hands of an official who is not thus protected by this tradition that same high, lofty ideal which we find so thoroughly worked out in the judiciary.

Either section 5 amounts to something or it amounts to nothing. If, as the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] the other evening, in response to my inquiry, admitted it did, it in effect gives this commission power to say to-day that a thing is the law and to-morrow to say that it is not the law, or to-day to say either that it is no law, or, by refusing to say that it is the law, let it remain outside the pale of the law, then it is the transfer to that commission of pure legislative power, a great power which I do not believe the time has yet come which warrants us in making that surrender.

Take, for instance, the question of local underselling. A bill of mine has been pending here for two years to apply to interstate traffic generally the prohibition against local underselling found in the statutes of Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and, I think, Nebraska and Kansas, as to petroleum products, the bill pending here to apply to all subjects in interstate commerce. It is now embodied in the so-called Clayton bill. But if the Clayton bill should not pass, will anyone question but what this commission could denounce that as an unfair practice or unfair competition? Will anyone doubt that they could withhold their denouncement of that as unfair practice or unfair competition? If, then, that is true, we are seeking to vest this commission with the absolute power of declaring what is the law or by refusing to make that declaration keep that principle without the pale of the law.

Now we come to the question of review by the courts. In 1906 for several weeks in this Chamber we listened to a discussion involving the question of a broad review or a narrow review. Day by day great Senators took their lofty flights skyward, and among the clouds indulged in a shadow dance over the question of narrow or broad equity review, when there is not a lawyer in the sound of my voice, or in the land, for that matter, but knows that so long as the court takes to itself the function of saying whether an act be constitutional or unconstitutional, so long as it exercises that function, it is beyond the power of Congress to enlarge or take away the constitutional rights of an American citizen. He gets those rights by virtue of the Constitution and the construction which the court places upon the Constitution. You can no more enlarge them than you can restrict them. He gets them not by virtue of statutory legislation, but by virtue of claiming his rights under the Constitution in the face of the fact that the court has taken upon itself the function of saying what are or what are not constitutional rights. In saying that they have taken upon themselves that function, I am not criticizing nor finding fault with them for having done so. I am dealing with the historical fact that the Constitution never vested them directly with that authority. The effort was made to give them the authority and it was refused at the time the Constitution was framed, but they have taken that authority unto themselves.

Now, again, we hear this same discussion of a broad review or a narrow review, and yet when you pin one discussing that question down you find that this review is based upon the constitutional right which the citizen may insist upon at the hands of a court of equity.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa seeks to provide this review in express terms. The bill as it was reported to the Senate from the committee simply provided that the commission could go into court to enforce its orders. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa, I say, attempts to define this power of review.

The court has laid down its own power in several of the cases read by the Senator from Iowa, and among those things which the court says it can pass upon, while it disclaims the function of weighing evidence, while it disclaims the function of deciding differently had it been called upon in the first instance to decide the question, still it retains the function of saying whether there is evidence to support the finding or not, and so long as the court retains that authority and that jurisdiction no terminology in a bill can define or limit the exercise of that jurisdiction or that power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unwittingly, I think, the Senator from Minnesota has inaccuately stated in one particular the amendment which I have proposed. My amendment does not attempt to say what jurisdiction or power the court shall have over the orders of the commission.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. It simply says, with regard to applications for the enforcement of an order of the commission, that—> the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity.

If, as urged by some Senators, the order of such a commission as we propose to establish could not have the effect which has been given to an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, then, of course, the court would not give it that effect. I have desired that when the order of the commission comes before the court it should then have just such effect as the law of the land, as declared by the judicial tribunals of the land, gives to it. I am protesting against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], now the committee amendment, because it distinctly and affirmatively enlarges and defines the jurisdiction of the courts. I believe, of course, under my amendment when the order of the commission would come before the court that it would be given just the effect that we have found similar orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission have had in what I regard as parallel instances; but I do not attempt, nor do I think it is safe to attempt, to define or prescribe what effect an order of a body of that kind shall have. We did not try to do so in the interstate-commerce law, and we ought not to try to do so here.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I certainly do not intend what I am about to say as in any sense a reflection upon the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. For years and years he has labored in season and out of season to serve the American people in endeavoring to solve the great problem literally of preserving their independence; for, sir, it matters not whether the purple robe and diamond crown adorn a person in the White House or a person in Wall Street, it is a mere question of form and not of substance. The Senator has struggled during all these years to save the liberty, industrial and commercial, of the American people. To this cause he has consecrated his great ability and tireless energy, subordinated every interest, even his strength and health. His former great colleague, Mr. Dolliver, gave his life to that struggle; but, Mr. President, we are confronted now with the proposition that in dealing with this innovation, in dealing with this giant problem, men of years of experience and of learning differ as to the terms, the meaning of the law to be enacted, and differ as to the interpretation which will be placed upon it.

In all the ages during which man has carved his pathway to free government there has been but little trouble, because as society recognized the necessity of meeting this or that condition society condemned the wrong in explicit terms and provided the governmental instrumentality for protecting the people by the enforcement of the law that thus condemned the wrong. I believe yet, with the President, that that is the true solution of this problem.

We can define wrongs, although we may lack the ability to frame legislation for a copartnership between government and big business, and that is what this measure is looking to in the last analysis. It is either that or it is nothing. If this proposed body has only the power to formulate a declaration, that then goes into court, as though the Attorney General in his office should make up his mind that some combination was violating the law, and such conclusion had no force save to move him to the prosecution of that offense, then we are building up this cumbersome, and, I may add, dangerous machinery, without securing any benefit thereby.

On the other hand, if this proposed law does mean something, if it does mean that this commission may declare a thing unlawful which Congress has not declared unlawful, if it means that it can refuse to declare something unlawful which subsequently in its experience and wisdom Congress would declare unlawful, then it is the abdication of legislative power, pure and simple, and is the most revolutionary proposition that has come before Congress in the long history of this Republic.

I agree with the Senator that we can not limit nor can we grant in respect to this question the power of the court over the findings of the commission. The court has said time and again that while it will not consider the expediency or wisdom of the order or whether on like testimony it would have made a similar ruling, yet its conclusions in review involve the question of whether the order is supported by evidence, whether it has been arbitrary, whether it has been in excess of the authority of the commission. So far as attempting to enlarge or define or limit the equity power of the court, when an American citizen appeals to that court upon the ground that his constitutional rights have been taken away, I insist now, as I insisted on this floor in 1906, that it is beyond the power of Congress to either limit or enlarge that power of the court.

Now, turning to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], he seeks in that amendment to give all parties to the proceedings the right of review. If I believed that that could be done under the provisions of this bill I would gladly support his amendment, but I do not believe that can be done, for the reason that if the commission fails to declare an act in violation of the law there is no violation of the law.

Take the matter of local underselling. If Congress neglects to pass upon that question in the Clayton bill, so that it then becomes an open question, and the commission should refuse to declare that practice an act of unfair competition, no court could declare that it was, because, while we have declared that unfair competition is unlawful and is forbidden, we have not declared, nor do we attempt to declare, what particular act falls within the ban of that prohibition. Consequently, if the trade commission, upon a complaint filed, should refuse to hold that underselling was unfair competition there would be nothing for the jurisdiction of a court to attach to or to act upon. So, while the amendment of the Senator from Ohio professes to give a review to the party suffering because of this unfair practice, in effect it does not do that, because that act in the law is not declared unfair and unlawful, that question being left to the commission, and until the commission says that it is unfair there is no violation of the law. It seems to me that there can be no question as to the soundness of that position.

Again, take the tying-contract practice. If the commission on a complaint fails to prohibit that as an unfair practice, there is then no declaration of law that it is an unfair practice, and to say that the party upon whom it is practiced has a right to have the decision of the trade commission reviewed by the court is simply to give him what in theory is a privilege but what in fact is not. So, under that view of this bill, you give big business two arrows in its quiver—one the commission and the other the courts—but the man who has suffered from the evil practices of big business has no remedy and no redress whatever.

Where did the Sherman law break down? Not in the attempt to enforce it. Such giant combinations as the Tobacco Trust and the Steel Trust, with their ramifications extending all over the country, were powerless to stay the hand of justice. In all history there never was a more splendid demonstration of the majesty of the law than when those great combinations were brought to the bar of justice; but what happened? When the smoke of battle had cleared away we found the stock of the various constituent companies of those organizations soaring skyward. There is only one thing that puts the price of stock up, and that is supposed value in the stock itself. As a result of the manner in which those corporations were reorganized there was a positive benefit to the stockholders, and there can be no benefit to a monopoly except there is a corresponding wrong done to somebody who is the object of the activities of that monopoly. In other words, we find that, so far as vindicating the majesty of the law is concerned, while the law was sufficient, while the courts were efficient, it was when the Attorney General of the United States—and I am not seeking to condemn or to criticize him; we are all apt to be obsessed with our relations to important affairs—it was when the Attorney General and the court, going beyond the purview of a mere judgment of prohibition, undertook to frame up a system wherein government and business were joined. With the example of the failure of the Sherman antitrust law at that point, I think we may well afford to shrink from the establishment of another relation between government and "big business" through the medium of an interstate trade commission.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] the other day disclosed the whole situation in one brief sentence. He said that the Department of Justice had been "slow"—I think he used that term—to prosecute; but that now we were going to have a commission that would stimulate activity along that line. It reminded me of the man who sent his younger son to hunt up the older son who ostensibly had gone after the cows, but inadvertently had stopped to amuse himself at a swimming pool. It is like placing some new guard rails along the top of a rotten bridge; they may improve the appearance, but add nothing to the strength of the structure below.

If the Attorney General will not enforce the law, how do you expect the law to be enforced by a commission that is still further removed from the one source of power that makes law enforceable, and that is the great rank and file of the people of the United States? If government is so weak that the one man standing out in bold relief, where the entire public can condemn him and him alone, will not enforce the law, what shall be said of the probability of enforcing the law at the hands of a commission, working in the "twilight zone" behind the scenes and sharing with the Attorney General, in a measure, responsibility for the enforcement of the law? It will simply confuse the public mind as to who is responsible and lessen the force of public opinion as a factor in securing the enforcement of law.

In free government, while it must ever be a government by man in the last analysis, we should make it just as automatic as it is possible to make it; leave just as little discretion as it is possible to leave in the mechanism of government and law, in order that the responsibility may be direct, and, the responsibility being direct, the law enforcing power may respond to the will and purpose of the only force that in the last analysis makes law enforceable, and that is public opinion itself.

Now, I am going to read a word from a speech made by the President in 1912. I do not read this in any spirit of criticism. I do not know the date of the speech; it appears in a work entitled "The New Freedom," which I have always assumed is a compilation of speeches made by the President in the campaign of 1912. As bearing upon this question of responsibility, the President says:

> If the Government is to tell big business men how to run their business, then, don't you see that big business men have got to get closer to the Government even than they are now?

Mr. Woodrow Wilson made no mistake in laying down that proposition. As I said this morning, in no spirit of humor, I do not fear that this commission will interfere with business; my fear is that business will interfere with the commission. If the commission has the power that some contend it has, it will at once become the object of the insidious attack of "big business," not that the men appointed commissioners will knowingly and dishonestly violate their oaths of office, but it so happens that the representatives of "big business" are ever able to hover around public officials, while the great rank and file of humanity, scattered in the shops, in the stores, and on the farm, have no such opportunity.

The only representatives they have are those who are sent here to serve them in the lawmaking and law-enforcing power, and it should be our duty to represent them. It should be our duty, in framing legislation, to frame it from the viewpoint, not of "big business," but of the great rank and file of the American people.

We no longer melt gold into a golden calf, but we seem to have been seized in this country with an obsession. We talk about "big business." It confronts us at every corner. There are two groups of business men in this country. I am reminded of the relation of "big business" to the general business of the country by an inquiry a school-teacher out in Minnesota once made of her class, as to whether any of them could tell the difference between a farmer and an agriculturist. One of them promptly threw up his hand, and when asked to define the difference replied: "A farmer is a man who farms a farm; an agriculturist is a man who farms the farmer."

We have in this country millions of business men, men whose interests are vitally involved in the welfare and prosperity of this country. They are the merchants, the mechanics, the laborers, the farmers, the bankers. Their prosperity is interwoven. We have another class of men in this country who do not build, who do not develop, but who only combine and manipulate those things which are the product of the energy and the ambition of the real business men of the country; who combine the instrumentalities created by others, binding them together, not to serve the people, but to serve themselves; not so much to make more things, but that they may often limit the making of things for the American people; speculating and gambling, capitalizing the statutes, capitalizing wind and water, capitalizing the future energy and ambition of the American people, capitalizing monopoly; and then, when the natural headache comes which follows a financial debauch, they mop their fevered brows and exclaim: "Oh, if they would only let business alone in this country."

Senators, in dealing with those men we have only one thing to consider, and that is their operations as they affect the body, rank and file, of the American people. So far as their manipulation of affairs goes, they will have financial headaches just as long as they have financial debauches. You may give a temporary relief with bromo seltzer, but if you are going to get permanent relief from the debauch headache the only thing to do is to cut out the debauch. Just so long as matters like the New Haven and similar exploitations go on, there will follow in the wake of such exploitations ruin and disaster. Yet this class, arrogating to themselves the trusteeship of the real business of the country, insist that they shall be the sole beneficiaries of legislation and administration solicitude. Our real solicitude should be the real business of the country.

If Congress had years ago passed the bill which my distinguished colleague has offered as a substitute for this bill, providing for the licensing of interstate corporations and requiring publicity to the transactions of men engaged in such enterprises as the New Haven and similar enterprises, there would have been no widespread disaster throughout New England to-day because of the collapse of that enterprise. What we want is plain laws defining what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong. Then, if the Attorney General does not enforce those laws, put in the hands of every individual who is injured by the violation of the law a right of action for the recovery of damages, and you would have an inspiration that would see to it that our legislation as to restraint of trade, monopoly, and unfair practices was carried out and enforced.

In response to the repeated requests of the Senator from Nevada that if we could not agree with him we should present some substitute, I have drawn a very simple bill:

SECTION 1. That unfair competition in interstate commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

From there on, either your trade commission bill is absolutely meaningless, a delusion and a snare, or else it is conferring upon five men, beyond the power of the voters of this country to reach, the power of legislation.

Then section 2:

That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to bring a suit to enjoin any corporation, firm, partnership, or person to prevent any act forbidden or declared unlawful by this act. Such action may be brought in the district court of the United States in any district where the corporation, firm, copartnership, or person against whom the suit is brought may have its or his principal place of business, resides, or may be found.

Under this bill, as you have now accepted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, every order of the commission is supposed to run the gantlet of the courts. Why confound and confuse this situation by creating the commission and then putting these people to the expense of a review in the courts? Why not simply, in the language of the President, define clearly and unmistakably what offenses are, and then, in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, as they have been pursued for over a century, clothe the law-enforcing branch of our Government with the power to bring suit to enforce the law?

Back of that, however, I would place a stimulant; I would place a force so that if, in the infirmities of human nature, in the weakness of our institutions, the Department of Justice did not move promptly enough I would have this provision:

SEC. 3. That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person, firm, partnership, or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant has its principal place of business, resides, or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages sustained and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

Of course I recognize that this legislation is not designed primarily to reach the individual. It is to secure a condition free from those practices that break down competition. Still you can not have a wrong, however, but that somewhere that wrong rests upon some individual. You can not, therefore, remedy a wrong without bringing relief to those who have been wronged. I care not whether it is a conspiracy in restraint of trade or whether it is the evil practices forbidden by this bill, in the last analysis it is a wrong because it is a wrong to some individual. You can not imagine an act that was worthy prohibition at the hands of Federal legislation unless somewhere the commission of that act was wronging some one. But it is not so much to correct that wrong as it is to put behind the law-enforcing function of our Government a stimulation that will result in activity in the enforcement of the law that I have proposed that provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to state at this point, as I stated yesterday, that if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is adopted I would vastly rather have the procedure just stated by the Senator from Minnesota. It is the procedure under the antitrust law.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And, in my opinion, if we go to the court with its jurisdiction broad enough to try every case upon its merits, we ought to go to the court in the first instance, and not be bothered or delayed by passing through the portals of the commission.

Mr. CLAPP. I quite agree in that respect with the Senator from Iowa. I can not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, because I do not believe it gives the remedy which, on its face, it purports to give. In saying that, of course it is needless for me to remark that no reflection is intended upon the Senator from Ohio. He, too, for years has been earnest in his effort to find some remedy for the evils that confront us in our industrial and economic life; but we have been carried away with this idea of a commission, developed largely, as I pointed out in the earlier portion of my remarks this afternoon, until we have become blinded. You ask men, "What do you want with this commission?" Their answer is, "Why, if you will just put these men in a commission they will do their duty; but put them in other offices, and they will fall short of their duty."

Why, Mr. President, there is nothing in the mere office of commissioner that is going to revolutionize human nature. These men will be no worse than the worst, and they can be no better than the best of men, surrounded by influences as they will be. You will simply add another lever in the mechanism of government; and in government, as in physical affairs, every time you add a lever you lose power. You can make levers working ever so easily, and multiply them until you can not move the extreme lever. So, in affairs that relate to the will and purpose and welfare of the people, you can multiply these governmental levers until the power of the people is absolutely lost and wasted. Nor is this any reflection upon the character of the men who will be selected to serve as commissioners. The weakness of the situation is in the condition in which they will be placed. All human experience has shown that the wrong ever seeks to narrow down the human equation it has to deal with, and all human experience has demonstrated that in proportion as you broaden the human equation you insure and make certain the establishment and maintenance of human rights. This is the fundamental of democracy. Then let us retain the lawmaking power in that broader equation which our fathers ordained, namely, Congress.

Let us make our laws plain and direct; let us provide for their enforcement plainly and directly, that the public may not be confused as to where they shall go or to whom they shall look for the enforcement of law; and then, not so much upon the theory that this is a personal contest between two individuals in trade, but as an incentive, as an inspiration, as a stimulant to the enforcement of the law, place it in the power of the citizen to move in the premises, and you will have no difficulty in securing a due enforcement of the law.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and printed as an amendment in the usual form and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered. Does the Senator desire it read?

Mr. STONE. I do not care for that; I read it this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say this: I am not sure that I shall offer the amendment. I simply desire to give, by this means, an opportunity to such Senators as may care to examine the suggestion to do so.

I am in favor of the general principles embraced in this bill, and am desirous of having legislation upon the lines proposed. I have no wish to start a new line of discussion which might disturb the present situation, as it seems we are drawing pretty well toward the close of the consideration of this measure. Possibly to-morrow morning, if the consideration of the measure is not completed to-night—as I hardly think it will be—I shall say something upon the subject of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri may be read. I have not heard it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, it is proposed to strike out all of that part of section 5 from and including line 20 to and including line 24, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 5. It shall be unlawful for any corporation to engage in any unfair or oppressive trade practice in the course of commerce, as herein defined, with the intent and purpose of destroying or unreasonably hindering the business of another or preventing another from engaging in business; and it shall also be unlawful for any corporation to engage in any unfair or oppressive trade practice in the course of intrastate commerce with the intent, purpose, and probable direct effect of destroying or unreasonably hindering the interstate or foreign commerce of another, or of preventing another from engaging in such business.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent any corporation from using any trade practice herein and hereby declared to be unlawful.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say but a few words. I do not propose to say anything regarding "unfair competition." I regard the argument as exhausted upon that subject. I wish to address myself simply to the question of court review.

There are three methods that we can pursue. One is to have no court review. Another is to have a limited court review. The other is to have a broad court review.

The bill reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee to this body provided for no court review. It simply provided that, so far as the order of the commission is concerned, if it was not obeyed the commission could apply to a court for a writ of injunction compelling obedience to the order.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa is a limited court review patterned after that which exists in the interstate-commerce act. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, and which is the joint product of himself and the Senator from Montana and which has been approved to-day by the Interstate Commerce Committee, provides for a broad review.

I wish to say, so far as I am individually concerned, that I stood with the Senator from Iowa in the memorable contest of some years ago regarding the Commerce Court bill for a limited court review, and we won. In framing this bill I proposed to make the order of the commission as final and conclusive as it could be made, but enforceable only by an application to a court of equity, leaving it to that court to determine what defense could be interposed by the corporation ordered to desist. I was conscious of the fact that such court would first consider as a judicial matter whether the constitutional rights of the corporation were invaded by the order; second, whether the order made was within the authority conferred by the statute; and third, whether the facts found in the order constituted the offense of unfair competition. I believed that that was all that the court could act upon under the bill as reported, and that is all that I wanted the court to act upon.

But we found ourselves met by the views of the Judiciary Committee which had been laboriously considering the Clayton bill, a bill containing provisions regarding interlocking directorates and holding companies, and also covering two practices in unfair competition, one relating to price discrimination and the other relating to tying contracts. Whilst originally they proposed to make those offenses unlawful and to visit them with criminal punishment, they concluded to change their bill and to make those provisions enforceable through the Federal trade commission, and they provided for a system of fairly broad court review. It was the opinion of the members of the Judiciary Committee almost unanimously—I believe the opinion of that committee was unanimous with the exception of the Senator from Iowa; so I am informed—that a broad court review should be given.

This difference of opinion existed between the friends of the bill. So far as I am concerned, I was willing to go further than the Senator from Iowa and provide for no court review, and allow the court in the judicial proceeding instituted for the enforcement of the commission's order to take such judicial action as it thought proper, and as it would take whether we provide for it by statute or not. But the friends of the bill were divided, as I have stated, and so five or six of us, members of the Judiciary Committee and members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, met the other evening to confer upon this subject, and we concluded to turn over the shaping of a measure with reference to court review to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Montana, their action to be submitted later on to the Interstate Commerce Committee. They framed the amendment as presented by the Senator from Ohio. Action was taken upon that by the Interstate Commerce Committee this morning and the Interstate Commerce Committee approved of that amendment.

So, for this reason, I stand for the amendment as presented by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to complete my statement——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, where does the difference lie between the questions which the court will consider without a court review and the questions which the court will consider with the court review? As I understand it, practically upon a suit brought by the commission to enforce the order under the provision of the bill as reported by the committee the court would simply consider the constitutional right, the question of authority, and the question as to whether the facts constituted the offense. Now, little more will be presented to the court under the broad review, the difference being that if the court finds upon the sworn affidavit of the corporation that there is newly discovered evidence which the corporation could not have produced at the trial below, an opportunity is given to present that. That is substantially about the only difference between the two, except that under the broad review not only the commission has the power to apply to the court to enforce the order, but the complainant upon whose petition the charge was originally made and the corporation affected by the order can also have the matter reviewed in the case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as he has stated that at a meeting of the Interstate Commerce Committee all its members voted for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio save myself——

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not state that with reference to the Interstate Commerce Committee. That statement was with reference to the Judiciary Committee. I stated that I understood all the members of the Judiciary Committee except the Senator from Iowa were for a broad review. I made no statement whatever with reference to the Interstate Commerce Committee. I will state now that we had only six members present this morning, but we were authorized to count two others present, which would constitute a quorum, and that of the six who were present five voted for the broad court review and the Senator from Iowa voted against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true, Mr. President. The Senator from Nevada might go further and state who were there. However, I will not press that inquiry. Possibly he had full warrant for stating the views of members of the Judiciary Committee with regard to the subject. I was not present in the Judiciary Committee when it was considered; I did not vote for it either one way or the other; and I am slow to believe that all the members of the Judiciary Committee prefer the broad review to the narrow review. However, the Senator from Nevada may know just how they feel about it; I do not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I merely stated that I was so informed. I do not pretend to know what the action of the committee was.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I simply wish to state, as the matter has been gone into by the Senator from Nevada, that in the Committee on the Judiciary at first the committee adopted the proceeding for a review similar to that provided for the Interstate Commerce Commission, drafted not exactly by me, but under my direction. Afterwards it was changed to the form in which it now appears in section 9b of the Clayton Antitrust Act.

But there are material differences between section 9b and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. I will not stop to go into detail, except to state that there was no provision in section 9b as originally written and as it now stands for an appeal to the circuit court of appeals of the United States. There was a distinct provision that the section should apply to persons and partnerships and associations engaged in interstate commerce as well as to corporations.

For these two reasons, if for no other, I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hollis	Newlands	Smoot
Bristow	Hughes	Norris	Stone
Bryan	James	Overman	Sutherland
Burton	Johnson	Owen	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones	Perkins	Thornton
Chilton	Kenyon	Pomerene	Vardaman
Clapp	Kern	Ransdell	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Reed	Weeks
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	West
Crawford	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	White
Culberson	Lewis	Sheppard	Williams
Cummins	McCumber	Shields
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ga.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD], and to state that he is paired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas obtained the floor, but after a pause said:

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] makes a suggestion to me that will carry this bill over until to-morrow, and it will be satisfactory for me to say what I have to say at that time. I will yield for that purpose, with the understanding that no vote is to be taken on the pending amendment this afternoon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] wishes to present a very important matter for the immediate consideration of the Senate, and I have promised to yield to him.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am authorized by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report and ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill amending the Vreeland-Aldrich Act so as to enable banks which have not 40 per cent of their capital invested in United States bonds and circulating medium issued against it to be permitted to receive emergency circulation under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act by the consent of the Treasury Department. The stock exchanges of all Europe have been closed; the Bank of England has suspended specie payment; the Bank of France has suspended specie payment; the Bank of Germany the same; and there is a possibility of some disturbance in our country unless we take immediate steps to prevent it.

With the permission of the Senate, I will read what has been prepared by the officers of the Treasury Department bearing upon this subject. It is a proposed amendment of section 27 of the Federal reserve act, the Federal reserve act in section 27 having amended the Vreeland-Aldrich Act and continued it until June 30, 1915; but the Vreeland-Aldrich Act provided that banks which have not an amount equal to 40 per cent of their capital invested in United States bonds, with circulation issued against it, might not avail themselves of emergency circulation. With the permission of the Senate, I should like to read this measure and ask for its immediate consideration.

A bill to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows—

The first part of the proposed amendment is merely a repetition of section 27, and I will indicate where the amendment begins.

SEC. 27. The provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, authorizing national currency associations, the issue of additional national-bank circulation, and creating a national monetary commission, which expires by limitation under the terms of such act on the 30th day of June, 1914, are hereby extended to June 30, 1915, and sections 5153, 5172, 5191, and 5214 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which were amended by the act of May 30, 1908, are hereby reenacted to read as such sections read prior to May 30, 1908, subject to such amendments or modifications as are prescribed in this act: Provided, however, That section 9 of the act first referred to in this section is hereby amended so as to change the tax rates fixed in said act by making the portion applicable thereto read as follows:

National banking associations having circulating notes secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall pay for the first three months a tax at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such securities, and afterwards an additional tax rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum for each month until a tax of 6 per cent per annum is reached, and thereafter such tax of 6 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such notes.

That is the act as it now stands. The proposed amendment is:

Provided further, That whenever in his judgment he may deem it desirable the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to suspend the limitations imposed by section 1 and section 3 of the act referred to in this section, which prescribe that such additional circulation secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall be issued only to national banks having circulating notes outstanding secured by the deposit of bonds of the United States to an amount not less than 40 per cent of the capital stock of such banks, and may permit national banks, during the period for which such provisions are suspended, to issue additional circulation under the terms and conditions of the act referred to.

I will say that many of the large banks—banks which are holding the reserves of the country banks—have not thought it desirable to have a large volume of United States bonds, but these bonds are practically absorbed now by the banks; $730,000,000 of them are held as security now by the Government of the United States for circulation and for advances made to national banks. So there is a very small volume of them available.

I therefore ask, in order to protect the country, that we may have immediate consideration of this measure.

I will state that the bill is a unanimous report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma reports a bill, which will be read by title.

The bill (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it is expected that this bill will be acted upon by the House to-night?

Mr. OWEN. Possibly so. The House committee is now considering the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. The same bill?

Mr. OWEN. The same bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in my opinion the situation in the world to-day, perhaps, would justify this hasty action on the part of Congress. I have, however, thought that rather than quiet the fears of our people this precipitate action might have the opposite effect as to many people, they thinking, perhaps, that the financial affairs of this country were in such condition that action of this kind was absolutely necessary to protect the banks. If the people understood that it is a precautionary measure for the protection of the banks, and thus secure their confidence in them, of course, there would be no evil effects from this hasty action, but if the bill is acted upon in this way and the idea should spread throughout the country that our financial affairs were in such a condition that immediate action of this character was necessary, and that the banks were not capable of meeting their obligations, I am afraid it would have the opposite of a quieting effect. However, as the matter has now been brought to the attention of the Senate and of the country, I think, of course, the only thing to do is to act upon the bill at once, though I believe the best way would have been to have introduced the bill, had it referred to the committee, and have it take the usual course of such legislation rather than to have had it acted upon in this manner.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Utah in that respect, but I should like to say in connection with the suggestion as to the financial affairs of the country, that the Nation never was in such a magnificent condition to meet this world-wide disturbance as it now is. We have over $1,500,000,000 of gold and silver in the Treasury in our trust funds. Besides that we have $150,000,000 of reserve gold. We have in addition to that $130,000,000 of free gold in the current funds of the Treasury. The banks of the country are in splendid condition generally, but to have them know that if they need it they can get $500,000,000 of emergency circulation will absolutely prevent anybody demanding currency, for they will not want it. The mere fact that they know they can get it will be all that will be necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call the Senate's attention to what the Senator from Oklahoma has already stated, for I hold in my hand the statement of the Treasury Department at the close of business on July 29, 1914. One purpose I had in rising was to call attention to the splendid condition not only of the United States Treasury but of the banks of the country. As to bank reserves, the amount which the banks are carrying is greatly more than the law requires, and nothing can disturb the banking business of this country so long as the confidence of the people is maintained in the banking institutions. There is no need whatever of any kind——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that the Committee on Banking and Currency have just met, have considered this matter, and are of one accord that under present circumstances it is proper to enact this legislation.

The situation is this: All the stock exchanges in the countries abroad have suspended; the banks of France, of England, and of Germany have practically suspended specie payment, and, while there is no immediate danger in this country, and while I agree entirely with the Senator from Utah that we are in a sound financial condition, I think it is very wise to take this precautionary step now.

The Treasury Department recommends the passage of this bill, and I can see no harm in enacting it. It is simply a matter of safety, to guard against any contingency or mishap. We do not know how far the war cloud may overspread Europe. If the present situation should eventuate into a general European war and be of a prolonged character, it is well that we should put ourselves in a position where we can continue to maintain our present financial supremacy. Therefore, I trust that we can pass this bill unanimously to-night because of its moral effect, not that I consider it immediately necessary, but it will have a steadying influence on the financial affairs of the country.

I desire to say, further, to the Senator from Utah that I am authorized, I think, by the Republican members of the Committee on Banking and Currency to express these sentiments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I fully agree with all that the Senator has stated, and my only purpose in rising was this: If the bill had been acted upon without any explanation and without any assurance upon the part of those who really know as to the condition of the Treasury of the United States and the banks of the country, the people might have taken alarm at this hasty action if nothing whatever had been said from the floor of the Senate. I desired, if possible, to assure the country that the action here taken, while unusual, is not taken because of the banks of the country being in financial trouble, but is taken as a precautionary measure only. That, Mr. President, is about all that I desire to say, and I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that immediate consideration shall be given to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said:

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the daily statement of the United States Treasury for July 29, 1914, showing the cash assets and liabilities, also the currency trust funds, the general fund, and the gold-reserve fund.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

[1] The act of July 14, 1890, provides that deposits made by national banks to redeem circulating notes shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and that the Treasury shall redeem from the general cash the circulating notes which come into its possession subject to redemption.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] concerning the available reserve of the United States is in the last degree gratifying. I want to emphasize the fact that in giving the amount of available financial resources of this country the Senator stated that there were in the Treasury fifteen hundred million dollars of gold and silver.

Mr. President, the silver money of this country, fortunately, although its coinage has been suspended, is nevertheless available at par and upon the ancient ratio; and if the countries of the Old World, instead of setting aside one of the two money metals of the world, had continued the old régime, the vast quantity of gold and silver available would, even under the present conditions, have made it unnecessary to suspend specie payment.

It is a lesson which we may take to heart, perhaps, and by learning from experience go back to the good old methods of finance and use both the metals, which the Almighty in His wisdom gave to the world for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

An act (S. 6192) to amend section 27 of an act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 27 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, is hereby amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"SEC. 27. The provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, authorizing national currency associations, the issue of additional national-bank circulation, and creating a National Monetary Commission, which expires by limitation under the terms of such act on the 30th day of June, 1914, are hereby extended to June 30, 1915, and sections 5153, 5172, 5191, and 5214 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which were amended by the act of May 30, 1908, are hereby reenacted to read as such sections read prior to May 30, 1908, subject to such amendments or modifications as are prescribed in this act: Provided, however, That section 9 of the act first referred to in this section is hereby amended so as to change the tax rates fixed in said act by making the portion applicable thereto read as follows:

"'National banking associations having circulating notes secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States, shall pay for the first three months a tax at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such securities, and afterwards an additional tax rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum for each month until a tax of 6 per cent per annum is reached, and thereafter such tax of 6 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such notes: Provided further, That whenever in his judgment he may deem it desirable, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to suspend the limitations imposed by section 1 and section 3 of the act referred to in this section, which prescribe that such additional circulation secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall be issued only to national banks having circulating notes outstanding secured by the deposit of bonds of the United States to an amount not less than 40 per cent of the capital stock of such banks, and may permit national banks, during the period for which such provisions are suspended, to issue additional circulation under the terms and conditions of the act referred to.'"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, now that we have passed this bill I desire to state that we have passed it, not because there is any immediate danger, but as a precautionary measure.

The difference between us and Europe in this emergency is this: Europe is engaged in mobolizing its armies and navies, while we are simply engaged in mobolizing our bank reserves.

PROPOSED ROUTINE BUSINESS.

Mr. CATRON. Out of order I ask leave to report a bill from the Committee on Military Affairs and have it placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico asks unanimous consent at this time to make the following report——

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for proper reference.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of sundry citizens of Linton, Temvik, and of the Evangelical Brotherhood of Fargo, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (for Mr. OLIVER) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. OLIVER) presented a petition of the Upholsterers' Local Union No. 124, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 259, International Union of the United Brewery Workmen of America, of Easton, Pa., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of the City Council of Astoria, Oreg., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 6190) for the relief of Mary Maynor; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 6191) granting an increase of pension to William Lockwood; to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Friday, July 31, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, August 1, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate July 31 (legislative day of July 27), 1914.

CONSUL.

Cornelius Ferris, jr., to be consul at Bluefields, Nicaragua.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS,

George G. Beams, to be receiver of public moneys at Lincoln, Nebr.

POSTMASTERS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 31, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We seek the uplift of Thy spirit, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, that with clear vision, pure motives, and earnest endeavor we may do the work of the hour, with an eye single to Thy glory, in the betterment of conditions; that peace and prosperity may unite our people in the making of good government, to the end that righteousness may live and grow in the hearts of all. And Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MAY STANLEY.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, on the 15th of the present month the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, with House amendments, was returned from the Senate and a conference asked. I desire to move that the request of the Senate for a conference be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

S. 1644. An act for the relief of May Stanley, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] asks unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. POU, Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, and Mr. SCOTT.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. POU rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-seven gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is the House dividing?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 200, nays 8, answered "present" 9, not voting 216, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to withdraw my vote and to be recorded "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, under the rules to-day would be devoted to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims. I ask unanimous consent to begin at No. 318 on the Private Calendar and to consider, by unanimous consent, from 318 to the end of the calendar, the bills from the Committee on Claims.

I think it is due the House that I make a brief explanation of my reason for making that request. The bills on the Private Calendar have been considered by unanimous consent up to No. 318. Now, in order to give every bill one opportunity for consideration by unanimous consent the call should begin at 318 and continue until the calendar is disposed of. Then we can go back to the beginning and start in the regular way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that the committee begin with No. 318 on the Private Calendar and take up the bills in order from that number on, by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does that mean all bills on the calendar?

Mr. POU. The request that I made was, bills from the Committee on Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Only bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANN. That would not give every bill a chance, as the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. POU. I qualified it by saying from the Committee on Claims; but if the gentleman insists on it, then I will ask unanimous consent to proceed with the Private Calendar, beginning at No. 318, by unanimous consent, after which I shall insist that bills from the Committee on Claims be given the preference.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman modify his request?

Mr. POU. I modify it by asking unanimous consent to begin with No. 318 and continue the call of the Private Calendar by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to begin on the calendar at No. 318 and to call the calendar from that number on. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

F. W. SCHULTZ.

The first business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15513) for the relief of F. W. Schultz.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the account of F. W. Schultz, postmaster at Junius, State of South Dakota, to be credited with the sum of $244.90, and that he cause said credit to be certified to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, being on account of loss by robbery of said post office on the 17th of October, 1909, it appearing that said loss was without fault or negligence on the part of said F. W. Schultz, postmaster.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota in reference to this bill. There seems to be some controversy as to whether the postmaster locked his safe or only put it on what they call a day lock. What information does the gentleman have?

Mr. DILLON. I will say that since this matter was up I have investigated more fully the files of the Post Office Department. Mr. Caldwell made three affidavits. The first one was made at the instance of the inspector. Upon examination of the papers in the Post Office Department I find an affidavit of that kind. Mr. Caldwell within six months thereafter made another affidavit stating that the dial to the safe was turned both ways and was not left upon the day lock. He then made another affidavit that the dial was thoroughly turned. I recently called his attention to the claim that he had made an affidavit before the inspector. I have an affidavit here in which he says that he has no recollection of making such an affidavit, but if he did, that portion of it is an error.

The facts are as set forth in the affidavit of July, 1910. I succeeded also in having the department locate the inspector's report—that the Committee on Claims did not have—and I would like to read a few lines of what the post-office inspector said in his report. He says:

> The loss would be hard upon him, as I understand he is working for wages. I realize that it would be out of place to recommend credit in this case, but as the loss sustained consisted of postage stamps only, some consideration might be given the postmaster, especially as I believe the safe would have been blown had the combination not been worked. The risk of detection at Junius was less than at Ramona, and the burglar who can work a combination can certainly blow up a safe. The postmaster and assistant bear excellent reputations, and I am satisfied that they were in no way responsible for the robbery.
> As near as I can determine, this robbery was committed by professional burglars, and the probability of arrest at this date is too remote to warrant holding the case longer.
> D. A. COLLIER, Post-Office Inspector.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that that part of it does not appeal to me in the slightest degree. If under the post-office regulations the postmaster deposits his money and stamps in a safe, turns the lock of the safe so that all the tumblers are turned and it is thoroughly locked, he is entitled to remuneration. If he turns only one tumbler, what they call a day lock, under the regulations he is not entitled to reimbursement. I understand the gentleman from South Dakota says that he has an affidavit now from the assistant postmaster who closed the safe that the safe was thoroughly locked.

Mr. DILLON. It was thoroughly locked.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wish to state that I introduced a bill for this claim in a former Congress. My recollection is that the assistant postmaster stated at that time, in explanation of the affidavit that was made before the inspector, that the inspector requested an affidavit, and the inspector prepared it, but that he did not seem to recall that he had made the statement in the affidavit. He did make two affidavits subsequently in which he sets forth that the safe was thoroughly locked.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I object.

WYLLYS A. HEDGES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13352) to allow credit in the accounts of Wyllys A. Hedges, special disbursing agent.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Wyllys A. Hedges, ex-receiver and special disbursing agent at the United States land office, Lewistown, Mont., the sum of $290, being the amount disallowed by the Auditor for the Interior Department in the settlement of his accounts for the period ended June 30, 1913, under the appropriation for "Contingent expenses of land offices, 1913," on account of salary paid Joseph E. Lamb as clerk at $1,200 per annum from January 5, 1913, to March 31, 1913, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, there is more or less information in the report, but there is nothing in it to show that the payment was ever made or ever disallowed.

Mr. STOUT. He did make the payment.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing to show that the Government disallowed it.

Mr. STOUT. It was disallowed, and the receiver paid the money upon the receipt of the telegram which is contained in the report.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has information that the disbursing officer made the payment to this man and the officer disallowed it?

Mr. STOUT. I have personal information, because it occurred in the town in which I live.

Mr. MANN. The fact that it occurred in the town in which the gentleman lives would be hearsay evidence.

Mr. STOUT. I have official information from the department.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EPPS DANLEY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17110) to reimburse Epps Danley for property lost by him while light keeper at the Pascagoula River (Miss.) Light Station.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Epps Danley, of the city of Pascagoula, Jackson County, Miss., out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $331.70 for property losses sustained by him during a storm on September 27, 1906, while light keeper of the East Pascagoula River (Miss.) Lighthouse Station.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, there are a number of these bills on the calendar, and I would like to get some information in regard to them. Does the Government become insurer of property of a lighthouse keeper, no matter what the property is? Some of these bills cover chickens, horses, cows, and property of that sort. When the Government employs a man as a lighthouse keeper, puts him in the lighthouse, furnishes him house rent or a dwelling, does it thereby insure all the property that he may accumulate in and around the lighthouse?

Mr. POU. I suppose the gentleman is proposing that question by way of indicating that he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not know; at one time I was favorably inclined to this bill which has been before Congress a great many years in some shape or other.

In this case there was a great storm on the Gulf of Mexico a number of years ago, and a number of lighthouses were destroyed, and the property of the keepers was destroyed. In some cases the keepers were maintaining little gardens and various domestic animals, which was perfectly proper for them to do. In the case of fire or storm, do we guarantee that we will return the value of that property to these keepers, or should we? I would like to have the gentleman's opinion upon that.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the view that the committee took was that it is unjust to a man when the Goverment puts him into a Government lighthouse and he takes his property there and a storm sweeps it away that he should not have reimbursement. It looks as if the Government should do one of two things, either make good the loss, or put him in a house that would be safe against storm.

Mr. MANN. But this was safe against any usual storm. Suppose the Government, instead of furnishing him quarters, as it does in many cases, should make him rent his house, as it does in some cases, and his house should burn; would the Government be expected to insure the property?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman speaks of a "usual" storm. He should remember that this was a most extraordinary storm.

Mr. MANN. I understand that this was a terrific storm.

Mr. HARRISON. It was the worst that that country ever experienced. In 1906 this man was stationed on this island, going about his duty assigned to him by the Government, and all of his property was swept away. It seems to me that this is a most reasonable claim.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice what the man himself says about it:

Although it was no fault of the Government, I think that I should not bear the entire loss. I would be very glad indeed if I could get one-half, if not all, as part reimbursement.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that was due to the fact that the man was of a generous disposition and did not think that he could get all, or did not know that he could get any. He needed it, and rather than lose it he thought he would take half.

Mr. MANN. Of course he would take anything that we give him, which is perfectly proper. The gentleman knows that immediately following this storm, which was seven or eight years ago——

Mr. HARRISON. It was in September, 1906, that it happened.

Mr. MANN. The Lighthouse Board in its annual report gave a list of losses by reason of this storm and recommended their payment. I believe at one time I introduced a bill—having then, in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, charge of lighthouse matters—for the payment of the claims. I do not remember whether this bill was ever reported favorably or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it was.

Mr. MANN. It did not pass. This was one of the claims.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There are several of these claims on this calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. There are two of this kind on the calendar—this one and the case of Poitevin.

Mr. MANN. There are at least two. I wonder whether the Government is to become an insurer of all the property belonging to a lighthouse keeper which is not only in the lighthouse but around the lighthouse or in the reservation. Does the gentleman himself think that we ought to become an insurer?

Mr. HARRISON. I think each case ought to stand on its own footing; and in this instance, this being such an unprecedented storm and these people being on the island and discharging the duties that go with the keeping of a lighthouse, and their property being destroyed and swept away, I think the Government ought to pay.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would not draw a distinction between one kind of a storm and another. What is the difference to the lighthouse keeper if the storm destroys his property?

Mr. HARRISON. I think a man ought to exercise some diligence and precaution about taking care of his property, and if it were not a very bad storm he could have done it.

Mr. MANN. If it was a bad enough storm to destroy his property, what difference does it make to him? Suppose the property burns.

Mr. HARRISON. That would be a different proposition.

Mr. MANN. Why? It would be through no fault of his, and he is put out there where he can not get the assistance of any fire company or fire engine.

Mr. HARRISON. Because of this man's very location, out on this island, he could not take care of the property. Because of the magnitude of the storm——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says "on this island." Was the other man on the island, too?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. As I recollect it, one was the assistant lighthouse keeper and the other was the lighthouse keeper. I think each case ought to stand on its own footing.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the gentleman has been here long enough to know as well as I do that when we pass a bill of this kind we create a precedent, where we can not draw a distinction, and we have to pay all similar claims, if we do justice. When they are once passed the committee, as a rule, reports them, as a matter of course; and Congress passes them, as a matter of course.

Mr. HARRISON. I realize that that is true.

Mr. MANN. And to-day we pass a good many bills the passage of which no one in the House 10 years ago probably would have advocated at all; but in course of time one bill went through and that created a precedent, and when we create a precedent we feel that we ought to proceed along those lines. I will ask the gentleman—well, I will not further question the gentleman who introduced the bill, but I am sure, if it were my bill——

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, if it were the gentleman's bill I would be in favor of its passage.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there would be 40 men who would think it ought not to pass if it were my bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLDFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. LANE, and Mr. JONES as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4845) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

SANFORD F. TIMMONS.

The committee resumed its session.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15735) to correct the military record of Sanford F. Timmons.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the committee we can complete this call by unanimous consent very much more rapidly if gentlemen will intervene objections after the reading of the title. If gentlemen have made up their minds to object it will save a great deal of time by not reading the entire bill, and I would like to complete this call if possible.

The CHAIRMAN. It is suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina that those who have definite views in opposition to measures will announce them before the reading of the entire bill, in order to save time. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN OURSLER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16430) for the relief of John Oursler.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

FRANCIS A. GRENNEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10328) for the relief of Francis A. Grennen.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the bill read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Francis A. Grennen, who was permanently disabled while engaged in the employment of the United States Government at Frankford Arsenal, in the State of Pennsylvania, on or about January 7, 1910, the sum of $5,000.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, can not the gentleman make a very brief statement?

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I am very familiar with this case, and I believe it is a most meritorious one. This young man is a veteran of the Spanish-American War and the son of a veteran of the Civil War. He lost his arm at the Frankford Arsenal while employed there, and now he is in very poor circumstances, with a wife and several children dependent upon him. His earning capacity, of course, is materially reduced, and in case he gets out of the arsenal, which is likely to happen any day, I do not know what will become of him. If this accident had happened to him in an industrial establishment in Pennsylvania, he would get a much larger sum than that which the committee has recommended in this bill. I trust the bill will be allowed to pass.

Mr. MANN. Let me see. This man was employed in the arsenal and is still employed in the arsenal. He is receiving as high compensation now as he did before he received the injury at the arsenal, and if my recollection is correct he is receiving a higher compensation, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. DONOHOE. No; $1.76 a day.

Mr. MANN. He has already been paid the amount allowed to him under the general law providing for compensation for employees injured in the Government service. He has received that amount in full. Now, having received that full amount which the law allows for compensation, and although he is still employed in the arsenal and has lost no money, whatever pain he may have suffered, he wants us now to make a special appropriation apart from all other people for an injury received in the Government service and be paid additional compensation.

Mr. DONOHOE. Well, the testimony shows that he is not very well able to work, that he suffers greatly at times from the loss of this arm, and that he has to have a doctor's attendance occasionally. As before stated, in case he gets out of the arsenal I do not know what he could turn his hand to.

Mr. MANN. Well, he might go out if he had the extra compensation, but as he is, he is likely to stay there.

Mr. DONOHOE. He might start some little business that would keep body and soul together if he got this little money. I know that his is a most deserving case.

Mr. MANN. If we start in to pay extra compensation after allowing a man full compensation that the law allows him——

Mr. DONOHOE. That is, one year's salary.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Under the act passed only a few years ago, and then in addition keep him in employment, which they ordinarily do not do, I do not see how we can proceed on that theory.

Mr. DONOHOE. If he lost an arm in the employ of a railroad, for instance, he would get fairly liberal damages in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. If he lost an arm in private employment the way he did lose the arm he would not get anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I shall object.

COLUMBUS, DELAWARE & MARION RAILWAY CO., OF COLUMBUS, OHIO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17102) for the relief of the Columbus, Delaware & Marion Railway Co., of Columbus, Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the receiver of the Columbus, Delaware & Marion Railway Co., of Columbus, Ohio, the sum of $119.26, taxes illegally collected under the excise tax act of August 5, 1909, for the years ending December 31, 1909 and 1910, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States against Whitridge, receiver, reported in Two hundred and thirty-first United States Statutes, page 144.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there are a number of bills like this upon the calendar, and I think the gentleman ought to give some explanation of them, and why we should pay them, all involving electric street car lines.

Mr. POU. I can perhaps explain better by reading from the report. "The object of this bill is to refund"——

Mr. MANN. There is very little information in the report on this bill, and I do not think you get much information by reading the report on this bill. I think possibly there may be some information in the reports on some similar bills, but there certainly is not much on this one.

Mr. POU. Well, the only explanation that can be made is that this tax was illegally paid by this corporation, and it had two years within which to obtain a refund of the tax, and for some reason it did not obtain that refund.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina what the purpose is of putting into a general statute a provision that if a man wants to have a claim paid he shall file his claim within a certain length of time if, the moment that it is applied, for that reason, the Committee on Claims reports a bill to pay the claim? That is the only excuse given in this report.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois the particular point was discussed in the Committee on Claims, and we took a vote on it. The majority of the committee decided that, in view of the fact that it was a pure technicality, they were in favor of returning this tax.

Mr. MANN. Here is a case where the Government collected a corporation tax. The law providing for the corporation tax authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to refund tax improperly collected, if the claim was made in two years. In this case the claim was not made in two years, and without giving, apparently, in this report any reason why the claim should be paid, it simply says because there is a statute of limitations they waive that statute of limitations. What is the object of having the statute of limitations if the moment it is applied, and for no other reason, it is to be waived? I regret that the gentleman from Ohio, who introduced the bill, is not here, because I would like to call his attention, and also the attention of the committee, to the fact that there is no such thing as "Two hundred and thirty-first United States Statutes."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. I propose an amendment which I think ought to go in. I move to strike out, on page 2, line 3, the word "Statutes" and insert the word "Reports."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the word "Statutes" and insert the word "Reports."

Mr. MANN. I am not sure whether that is correct or not. The bill says it refers to a case reported in the Two hundred and thirty-first United States Statutes. The report refers to it as reported in the Two hundred and thirty-first United States Reporter. I do not know whether they have reference to the United States Reports or not. Somebody ought to be able to tell. What does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] say?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no such thing as United States Reporter of that number or statute of that number.

Mr. MANN. I assume that my amendment is a correct one.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman I can not answer his question just at the moment.

Mr. MANN. As there is no such thing in the books as Two hundred and thirty-first United States Statutes, according to my recollection, and there is no such thing as Two hundred and thirty-first United States Reporter, I judge you mean "Reports."

Mr. POU. I am sure there is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

RICHMOND, FREDERICKSBURG & POTOMAC AND RICHMOND & PETERSBURG RAILROAD CONNECTION CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16370) for the relief of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac and Richmond & Petersburg Railroad Connection Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac and Richmond & Petersburg Railroad Connection Co., a corporation created by and organized under the laws of the Commonwealth of Virginia, the sum of $255.81, the said sum being taxes illegally collected under the excise-tax act of August 5, 1909, for the year ending December 31, 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, of course the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], with all of the bills on his mind, does not recall the reasons for the payment of these taxes collected from the street railway company. I think that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], who introduced this bill, ought to tell us why we are paying this money back.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As I understand, Mr. Chairman, this money is to be paid back pursuant to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of McCoach, collector of internal revenue, against Minehill & Schuylkill Haven Railroad Co. (228 U. S. Repts., p. 295). The statute of limitations had precluded this case; at least it was not presented until a few months after the statute of limitations had expired.

Mr. MANN. What was the decision?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That the tax was illegally collected. If the gentleman will permit me to say it, the House, on June 12, 1914, passed a bill similar to the one now under consideration, to refund to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. taxes similarly collected.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the Milwaukee case was different, and there was a complete and full report in that case, showing that on a reexamination of the books by the Treasury officials they had made a mistake theretofore. Whether it was paid under this decision or not, I do not know. What was the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. I have the decision here to which the gentleman from Virginia refers, and I will read the syllabus of the portion that is involved in this case. This comes from Two hundred and twenty-eighth United States Reports, on page 295, and is as follows:

A railway corporation which has leased its railroad to another company operating it exclusively, but which maintains its corporate existence and collects and distributes to its stockholders the rental from the lessee and also dividends from investments, is not doing business within the meaning of the corporation-tax act.

Mr. MANN. I did not quite get that. Do not read it, but tell me what it is.

Mr. DILLON. It comes from the rental of the properties, and the court holds that that is not included within the meaning of the corporation-tax law of 1909.

Mr. MANN. What is not? I would like the gentleman's own statement as to what was the tax that was illegally collected.

Mr. DILLON. Well, I have not gone into the details of this case.

Mr. MANN. I mean from the gentleman's gathering of the opinion.

Mr. DILLON. I simply read the syllabus of the case here. I sent over for it. I have not examined it technically or fully as to the text of the opinion. I simply read the syllabus.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection.

MONTGOMERY & ERIE RAILWAY CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17085) for the relief of the Montgomery & Erie Railway Co.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Montgomery & Erie Railway Co. the sum of $45.81 illegally collected from said company under the excise-tax act of August 5, 1909, for the years ending December 31, 1909, and December 31, 1910, by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of McCoach, collector, against the Minehill & Schuylkill Haven Railroad Co., reported in Two hundred and twenty-eighth United States Reports, page 295.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM S. COLVIN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12949) for the relief of William S. Colvin.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the postal account of William S. Colvin, postmaster at Hamilton, Kans., with the sum of $424.06 for postal funds and stamps, and with the further sum of $23.60 for money-order funds, on account of losses resulting from a burglary on November 18, 1910.

SEC. 2. That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $447.66 for the purposes specified in this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, apparently this is a case where the postmaster made no attempt to comply with the postal regulations.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think he made a bona fide attempt and did comply as best he could with the regulations.

Mr. MANN. Well, here is a statement credited to the postmaster. It is stated by the postmaster in his affidavit here:

Stamps and money lost by this robbery were in the safe, and the bolt was turned on. The safe could be opened without working the combination.

That is one statement. Another is:

The stamps and money were in the safe, and the lock was turned on, but the combination was not turned.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There was a reinspection, in which the whole matter was gone over again; and I remember he stated in his affidavit that the safe was locked. The inspector made a report that it was not entirely locked.

Mr. MANN. I have not been able to find any such statement as that in the report. Here is a letter from the Postmaster General, dated May 25, 1914, and apparently the Postmaster General had never heard of such a statement.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Colvin has always complained of the report made by the inspector, and I am satisfied that, regardless of the locking of that safe down there in this little fourth-class post office, where the loss was possibly as much as the entire annual salary, it would have made no difference. The burglar could have gone right on in, anyhow. It was one of those little fireproof safes not even advertised as being burglar proof.

Mr. MANN. Oh, whether it is advertised to be burglar proof or not, the postmaster is appointed and he knows what the regulations are, and he is frequently informed by the inspector as to what he must do with the money and postage stamps. He must put them in the safe and lock the safe. This man put them in the safe and did not lock the safe, and they were taken out of the safe. Now he seeks to excuse himself by saying that if he had locked the safe the burglar would probably have broken it open.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is what I said; those are my words, not his.

Mr. MANN. In that case you might just as well say you should leave the money lying out on the table, because he could break in and get the money, anyway.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Those were my words about the burglar getting the money, anyway.

Mr. MANN. That is what the postmaster stated. I am not taking the gentleman's words. That is the excuse he gave for not locking the safe. He said that if the safe had been locked it would doubtless have been blown open and destroyed. That may be considered a very good reason for never locking the safe, but it hardly appeals to me.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does the gentleman think that this postmaster should stand this loss where he made a bona fide effort to comply with the regulations?

Mr. MANN. But he did not make a bona fide effort to comply with the regulations. He did not attempt to lock the safe. He said it was a hard lock to handle, and therefore he did not try to lock it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He was afraid he could not get it open, or something of that kind.

Mr. MANN. He ought to have had somebody there who could open it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the gentleman will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, "Hope springs eternal in the human breast."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next one.

HENRY WEAVER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16305) to reimburse Henry Weaver, postmaster at Delmar, Ala., for money and stamps stolen from said post office at Delmar and repaid by him to the Post Office Department.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Henry Weaver, of Delmar, Ala., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $94.67, the amount of money and postage stamps stolen from the post office at Delmar, Ala., on the night of September 26, 1910, while he was postmaster at Delmar, and which money and stamps belonged to the said post office, and which said sum he was required to repay, and did repay, to the Post Office Department of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ANATASIA HOGAN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14956) to reimburse the postmaster at Kegg, Pa., for money and stamps taken by burglars.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $72.54 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of reimbursing Anatasia Hogan, postmaster at Kegg, Bedford County, Pa., for money and stamps stolen from that office by burglars March 7, 1910, the said Anatasia Hogan having made good the loss to the Post Office Department out of her own funds by the payment of the aforementioned sum to an inspector of the said department February 28, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, here is a case where there is no pretense that the regulations were complied with. The excuse for it is that at the time the burglary occurred the mother of the claimant, the claimant being the postmistress, was at the point of death and died shortly after the burglary. The postmistress on that account was spending the night at her mother's house and did not remove the stamps and money from the post office. Of course, that is a good reason for spending the night at her mother's house; but is that a reason why the Government should take the chances on the loss?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, it may not be a very good reason. The postmistress was undoubtedly under great stress at the time. She had no safe in the office, and never had one.

Mr. MANN. I understand; it is not a case of a safe.

Mr. BAILEY. The stamps had to be kept in her bedroom. Under the stress of sickness in her home she forgot the ordinary duties and was thinking only of the duty she owed to her mother. I suppose that all the regulations were violated in that instance. This is a case of pure charity, I think, to a deserving woman.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I was once in charge of a country post office, and I violated the regulations all the time in reference to keeping money, because I thought I could keep it more safely without complying with the regulations than I could by complying with them; and I was frequently notified by the department that the postmaster would be dismissed because I violated the regulations. But I knew I was taking my chances on it. I thought it was safer to keep the money in a bank than it was to keep it in my jeans. The Post Office Department had a regulation that I should carry it in my pocket instead of putting it in a bank. Well, I put the money in a bank, but I took the chances. If the money was lost, I did not expect that I would ask the Government to reimburse me for it.

Mr. BAILEY. We are bound to allow something to a woman that we would not allow to a mere man.

Mr. MANN. We are getting to that point now where we are going to give women the right to vote and everything else and put them on an equality in business with everybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. I offer an amendment. There is an error in the bill in not including all that was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "of," strike out "$72.54" and insert in lieu thereof "$84.54."

Mr. BAILEY. That was the amount that was lost.

Mr. MANN. This bill proposes to reimburse her for the postage stamps that were lost, but not for the money that was taken.

Mr. BAILEY. There was $12 in postal funds.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I know; but there is absolutely no excuse for paying her the money. If we reimburse her for the stamps that were lost, I think she is in great luck.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if the gentleman objects, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MANN. No; I am not objecting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the amendment. The question is on laying aside the bill to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ESTATES OF JOHN FRAZER AND ZEPHANIAH KINGSLEY, DECEASED.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12679) to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and adjudge the claims of the estate of John Frazer, deceased, and of the estate of Zephaniah Kingsley, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, given to the Court of Claims (notwithstanding any statutory bar of limitations) of the claims of the estate of John Frazer, deceased, and of the estate of Zephaniah Kingsley, deceased, known as east Florida claims, and which were the subject of and provided for in the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain, to provide for the complete execution of the ninth article of the said treaty, with power to find the facts therein and to render judgment against the United States in accordance with the law of nations for the unpaid portion or residue of the awards as made for said claimants by the judges of the Superior Court of St. Augustine, in the Territory of Florida, and by the judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida, under and by virtue of the acts of Congress passed to carry into effect the ninth article of said treaty.

SEC. 2. That in considering the said claims the Court of Claims is directed to consider the findings of fact and all evidence submitted to and now on file within the United States or of record with and on which said awards were in whole or in part based.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that this bill seeks to confer upon the Court of Claims authority to reverse a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, various decisions of Secretaries of the Treasury, and the opinions of various Attorneys General, it seems to me that some one ought to explain the purpose of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, the statute of limitations has barred this claim here.

Mr. MANN. Inasmuch as it arises out of a treaty of 1819 it is quite likely that it has been barred; but I do not know. Gentlemen were trying the other day to pay some claims that were a hundred years old, and the statement was made that they were not barred.

Mr. FOSTER. This is with the intention of recovering interest on a claim the principal of which was allowed at that time, is it not?

Mr. MANN. Oh, much more than that.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought that was one of the principal things.

Mr. MANN. That is one of the things; but the Supreme Court of the United States decided one way, various Secretaries of the Treasury decided the same way, and various Attorneys General decided the same way. This seeks to reverse the whole theory of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a recall of decisions.

Mr. MANN. Yes. The Supreme Court decided in this case that the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to do or not to do, and the Secretary of the Treasury decided against the claims several times, as I now recall, under opinions of the Attorney General. I dislike very much to object to all these bills, but I think somebody ought to be prepared to give some reason for passing a bill like this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

W. W. TAYLOR.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17028) for the relief of W. W. Taylor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. W. Taylor, of Whitefish, Mont., the sum of $316, to compensate him for surgical and hospital services rendered Mary Bull, an Indian ward of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill whether he thinks the Government whenever an Indian gets drunk and gets injured ought to pay the doctor's bill, whoever the doctor may be?

Mr. EVANS. I do not think so, necessarily. I think this particular claim ought to be paid, for the reason that this doctor was called in. He had nothing to do with the matter. He found a woman mangled by a train, and he took her to the hospital and cared for her. She was a ward of the Government. It was an act of humanity. He had either to let the woman die or render the service.

Mr. MANN. I would have very little respect for a doctor, and I would not be willing to pay him a cent, if he took the position that he would let some one die because he did not know who was going to pay the bill, in a case where a leg had been cut off.

Mr. EVANS. He did not take that position. He took the woman to the hospital and paid the hospital bill.

Mr. MANN. He took the woman to the hospital, but I do not suppose he paid the hospital bill, although he has put in a bill for it.

Mr. EVANS. He is responsible for it.

Mr. MANN. He was one of the officials of the hospital, was he not?

Mr. EVANS. I do not think he was. This was a charity hospital, and he was a doctor there at Whitefish.

Mr. MANN. This is a case where an Indian woman got drunk and lay down on the track of the Great Northern Railway, and a train struck her and cut off her leg. The doctor was called and took her to a hospital, as any humane doctor ought to do. Supposing it had been a white man, would the Government have to pay that bill?

Mr. EVANS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Why does the Government have to pay this bill then?

Mr. EVANS. Because this woman was an Indian and a ward of the Government, and I think the Government is responsible to a degree for the care of these people in case of sickness and accident.

Mr. MANN. No; the Government is not responsible at all. I do not even know whether this woman belonged to an Indian tribe or not. There is no information here on that subject, nor whether the Indian tribe had any funds, nor whether the funds are liable for any services rendered to the Indians. Does the gentleman claim that when an Indian comes to Washington and gets drunk and gets injured the Government has to pay the doctors who attend him?

Have we reached that point where whatever happens to an Indian they can come to the Treasury of the United States for reimbursement?

Mr. EVANS. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman, but this case does appeal to me.

Mr. MANN. I think the doctor has appealed to the gentleman.

Mr. EVANS. I think that some one should take care of this party, the Indian being a ward of the Government.

Mr. MANN. I suppose if this person had been a white person without money precisely the same thing would have been done that was done in this case.

Mr. EVANS. I anticipate that that is so.

Mr. MANN. If anybody is to pay the bills, it ought to be the municipal authorities of the city or of the State of Montana. Doctors have to furnish more or less services of this kind free, and they aim to make it up off the rich, because they made their bills according to the size of the pile of the patient.

Mr. EVANS. I take it from the report of the Indian Office that if they had had any funds available they would have paid the bill. They thought the bill was a just bill, but said they had no funds. The matter was investigated by the Indian agent.

Mr. MANN. They said that there was no fund applicable for the payment of this matter, but whether there were any funds that could be appropriated I do not know.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that the railroad company paid $40. If there was no liability, why did they pay $40?

Mr. EVANS. I do not know. They paid that much and declined to pay more.

Mr. CANTOR. There is no liability in this case on the part of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. No; it would be just a gift.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

GOSHEN & DECKERTOWN RAILWAY CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17086) for the relief of the Goshen & Deckertown Railway Co.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Goshen & Deckertown Railway Co. the sum of $158.41, illegally collected from said company under the excise tax act of August 5, 1909, for the years ending December 31, 1909, and December 31, 1910, by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of McCoach, collector, against the Mine Hill & Schuylkill Haven Railroad Co., reported in Two hundred and twenty-eighth United States Reports, page 295.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PATERSON & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17074) for the relief of the Paterson & Hudson River Railroad Co.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Paterson & Hudson River Railroad Co. the sum of $481, taxes illegally collected under the excise tax act of August 5, 1909, for the year ending December 31, 1909, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of McCoach, collector, against the Mine Hill & Schuylkill Haven Railroad Co., reported in Two hundred and twenty-eighth United States Reports, page 295.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PRESTON B. C. LUCAS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1108) for the relief of Preston B. C. Lucas.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Preston B. C. Lucas the sum of $500, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I think we ought to have some explanation of this matter.

Mr. HAWLEY. This claim arises out of the resurvey of public lands. Mr. Lucas took a homestead claim, on which he made proof in 1906. This land had been surveyed by the Government in 1898 and the corners established as Mr. Lucas had found them when he filed on the land. He had taken the lines as they had been established by the survey of 1889. He built his house and other improvements on the corner where there was a little stream furnishing good water and where there was a good piece of land to cultivate.

After he had filed on the land, proved up on it under the survey, and got his patent, the question was raised as to the accuracy of the survey of 1898. Another party filed on a piece of land just north of his and claimed that the improvements made by Lucas was on the land of the second party and to which he was properly entitled.

The question of the line between the two claims was tried out in the court after the county surveyor had run the lines over again and reestablished the corners, and the court and the surveyor decided in favor of Mr. Lucas. The party who made the second entry appealed to the United States Government Land Office, on the ground that a former survey had been made in 1878, and that under the survey of 1878 the land as entered by the second entryman should be delimited by the survey of 1878 instead of the survey of 1898. A deputy inspector of surveys was sent out and decided on the lines of the original survey. That took away from Mr. Lucas some 20 acres of his patented land with all of his improvements on it. He took every precaution before locating his house or improvements. He privately employed a surveyor to go over the lines, and went down to the land office in Portland and examined the records, and there found that the second survey had been made in 1898, accepted by the Government, and paid for. I do not know whether he was aware of any former survey or not, but he knew about the latest survey accepted by the Government, and undoubtedly, in his mind, that was the final and controlling survey.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand from the reading of the report, he settled on this land and, as he thought, had gotten a piece of land described by the surveyor of the United States, and afterwards some one filed a claim to a part of the land which this man claimed belonged to him.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And he secured the services of the county surveyor, and he went over the land and found that the lines were 20 rods over on Mr. Lucas, and thereby the other party secured some of the improvements that were made on the land.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Lucas went on the land and located his entry under the survey of 1898, which lines were run by Branson in that year. That survey was accepted by the Government, paid for, and became public notice to everybody that that was the survey and boundary of that particular quarter section. Mr. Lucas proved up on it and got his patent. After all this happened, the party locating north of Mr. Lucas raised the question that the Branson survey was not the true line; that there had been a former survey in 1878 by Meldrum. The question of what the county surveyor may have done would have no bearing on this question as far as the United States Government was concerned.

But Mr. Lucas, as I said before, took every precaution to ascertain where the line established by the United States ran. After he had proved up and gotten his patent this person on the north, claiming the Meldrum line was the true line, asked the United States Government to rerun the line or reexamine the surveys, and go out there and establish a line. That examiner was assigned to do the work, and he went out there and decided in favor of the Meldrum line, run in 1878, as against the Branson line, run in 1898, and that decision of the examiner as between the two lines took away some 20 acres of land patented to Mr. Lucas.

Mr. FOSTER. This man knew about the two surveys when he went onto the land.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no special word from him, but I think that it might be supposed that he had some knowledge that there was a former survey.

Mr. FOSTER. He knew the two surveys differed, and he took his chances on the last survey, as I understand.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, when the Government makes a resurvey of a piece of land, that is almost uniformly accepted as the real survey. It is rerun on account of the corners of the original survey having been obliterated, the witness trees destroyed, or some other thing having happened that makes the former survey no longer traceable. Then they send out a man to resurvey the line, and the new or latest survey is the official survey in almost every instance. I know of a number of resurveys, and I do not recall of any case other than this one where they have held the second survey was not the official survey, and it was put on the records of the Government and became public notice to everybody that that was the boundary line.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the second survey?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But it seems the man did not take any precaution to find out which one was right.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, he took every precaution. He made every examination as to where the lines were, and went to the land office in Portland and got in touch with the officials there, or did so through his representative, I have forgotten which, and they told him about the Branson survey and where the lines ran.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps the record discloses the fact, but I have not gone over it carefully. Can the gentleman tell me when the entryman discovered that his lands were north of the tract which he had sought to enter?

Mr. HAWLEY. After he got his patent.

Mr. MONDELL. In the meantime had some one settled upon the other tract?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; after he had gotten his patent.

Mr. MONDELL. And this other man was claiming the land on which his improvements were?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. And the other party did hold the improvements and utilize them?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. The other party, after the Government decided in favor of the Meldrum survey, was sued by Mr. Lucas in the State district court for the value of the improvements in order that he might exhaust every remedy he had in the local courts, and the court held that Mr. Lucas was damaged without recourse, and that the party taking the new claim to the north was entitled to the improvements, and he has them now without any compensation to Lucas.

Mr. MANN. Did not Mr. Lucas win the suit?

Mr. HAWLEY. That was about the boundary, but not about the improvements.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand this case, Mr. Lucas made a homestead entry, and made it in accordance with the boundary line as fixed by the surveyor who had surveyed a certain township under contract with the Government?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that surveyor had fixed the northern boundary line of that township on a certain marked line, and he ran his homestead entry up to that north line?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that the Government also had another surveyor under contract to survey the township to the north, and that surveyor had fixed the south boundary line of the township to the north farther south than the Lucas surveyor, if I may use that term, had fixed the northern line of the township?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So that there was an overlapping of the township lines?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that subsequently the Government sent a new surveyor there and he established the township line as true, according to the southerly boundary of the township lying to the north?

Mr. HAWLEY. Of the first survey.

Mr. MANN. That being the case, does the Government, when it makes a survey of land, insure the correctness of that survey?

Mr. HAWLEY. When the Government makes a survey of lands and accepts entries by an entryman and the entryman goes on the land and puts on valuable improvements, the Government, after he has gone on there and accepted the survey last established by the Government, the one most plainly marked, ought not to deprive him of that land.

Mr. MANN. But the Government does not deprive him of any land, for he never had it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, yes; they patented it to him.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the Government patented him the northeast corner of a certain section, if it happened to be the northeast corner.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the patent run under the last survey.

Mr. MANN. The patents do not say under the last survey. The patent runs describing a certain piece of a section in a certain township. I dare say that the Government surveys throughout the portion of the country where I was raised have all been corrected, that there is not a single line now running the way it ran 75 years ago, and that no one of them was absolutely accurate; and I dare say that very few of them are accurate now. What does the Government do? It lets a contract to a surveyor to go and survey so much for a certain consideration on a contract basis. There is no guaranty on the part of the Government that the surveys so made are absolutely accurate and they never are. Now, does the Government became a guarantor when it gives a man a piece of property that the survey which the Government has caused to be made, according to a time-established custom, must be accurate, and, if not accurate, must the Government pay the man any damage that he has been put to or any damage for property that he loses?

Mr. HAWLEY. When the Government establishes a survey and accepts an entry under it and a man makes improvements on it, and then it is resurveyed in order to establish a true line, and the man makes every possible effort to find out where the true line runs, and the Government issues to him a patent on that land as applied for under the latest accepted survey, it ought not thereafter to change the line last run, plainly established and accepted by the Government, and thereby deprive him of a portion of the land, especially that on which his improvements are made, and give it to some other person who makes entry after this first entryman has received patent.

Mr. MANN. Of course the Government ought to have people who do everything perfectly, but the Lord has not made that kind yet. Now, you have two sets of surveyors working toward the same line. One of them establishes a line at a certain place and the other one, coming from the other direction, establishes what should be the same line a few feet away. Of course that is inaccurate, but that has been the way the world over from time immemorial. Of course the Government does not guarantee that is correct——

Mr. FOSTER. The Government in issuing a homestead patent does not guarantee.

Mr. MANN. No; it does not state what the line is.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not give the line——

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, yes; the Government does give the line.

Mr. FOSTER. It gives the patent——

Mr. MANN. By description

Mr. FOSTER. By description.

Mr. HAWLEY. No; it goes further than that. You can not make entry before the land is surveyed and the survey accepted. The surveyor comes and makes a survey and the examiner approves it and the General Land Office accepts it. The Government establishes the lines, and under the established lines the entryman is entitled to make his entry. So the Government establishes the lines before the entryman gets the land, and the Government ought not to change the boundary and deprive the man of his land after he goes on the land, proves up on it, and receives patent for it as applied for under a survey accepted by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe we ought to establish such a question by this kind of a bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Oregon is correct that ordinarily the Government does guarantee to a man the monumented area that he enters. That is the only guaranty they can give him, that if he enters a piece of land that is described correctly, the land he receives is the tract as monumented. It may be described differently on a plat somewhere, but the land he receives is the land that is monumented. The Government does not guarantee the acreage. There may be more or less, but it does guarantee him that the land within certain limits is his. This is a very unusual case. There are very few cases of this sort where one survey overruns another and both surveys are accepted, or where there have been two Government surveys overlapping each other, both approved. I know of many cases where there is a hiatus between township and range boundaries. I do not remember having heard of a case where township boundaries of accepted surveys overlapped each other with monuments in place. There is certainly an equity here, and it is not the sort of case that is going to occur very often, though there are many cases where there is a question as to the location of the lines of survey and where the determination by the settler as to survey corners is afterwards proven to be erroneous.

Mr. HAWLEY. Where the change was made and in reference to not finding the corners.

Mr. MONDELL. There are many cases where it is practically impossible to find the corners and he afterwards suffers serious loss by reason of that fact.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is on the Government corner.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a case where there is no doubt about the Meldrum survey having been accepted, and Meldrum was a man who made a good many surveys for the Government and has a good reputation, as I recall it, as a surveyor. Then there came a subdivision survey, where a man was supposed to have closed on the Meldrum line. The Government assumed that its agent closed on the Meldrum line or the survey would not have been accepted. As a matter of fact, he did not close on the Meldrum line, but ran beyond it. The Government is clearly bound by what he did. It established two separate and distinct surveys. It is a very unusual case, and it is not a case that will establish a serious precedent. In many years experience in public-land matters and in public-land States I do not recall I ever heard of just such a case. This man located on land as the Government described by monuments. There is no question about that. Then a Government surveyor came along, and they held that the former survey was the official township line and must stand. The Government saw fit to accept the Meldrum or former survey as the official survey, and in so doing they deprived this man of property that had been patented to him.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I made somewhat of an investigation of this claim as a member of the subcommittee. As I understand the facts, they are these: The Meldrum survey was made in 1878, and the township lines were established; the Government accepted the survey of the township lines. In 1898 Branson became the surveyor of the interior sections of the township and made a survey of the same, and when Branson made his survey the Government accepted it. Mr. Lucas made his filing and received his patent under the Branson survey. Now, they had a suit in court, Lucas winning the suit. The patent was issued to him. The party who borders him on the north claimed that the corner was farther north, and he appealed to the department. The department then ordered a retracing of the township lines, and Mr. Douglass was sent there for that purpose—to ascertain where the true corner was on the township line—and when that was ascertained it was moved farther south. That survey was approved, and they deprived Mr. Lucas of his land. It seems to me that this is an equitable claim.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

F. W. SCHULTZ.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to the bill H. R. 15513, No. 318 on the calendar, for the relief of F. W. Schultz.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to return to No. 318 on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is that claim?

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] made an objection, and I ask to return to it in order that it may be reconsidered.

Mr. FOSTER. What is that?

Mr. DILLON. That is a post-office case, No. 318 on the calendar.

Mr. FOSTER. I object to that myself.

ESTATES OF JOHN FRAZER AND ZEPHANIAH KINGSLEY, DECEASED.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to the bill which is No. 330 on the calendar, H. R. 12679, to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and adjudge the claims of the estate of John Frazer, deceased, and of the estate of Zephaniah Kingsley, deceased.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revert to bill with calendar No. 330. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what does that mean—to ask unanimous consent for its consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to revert to it.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to having the question stated again as to whether or not there is objection. I do not wish to foreclose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revert to Calendar No. 330. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12679) to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and adjudge the claims of the estate of John Frazer, deceased, and of the estate of Zephaniah Kingsley, deceased.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has already been reported. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] desire to make a statement?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I think there must have been some misunderstading as to the purpose of this bill. I want to state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I think he misunderstands its purpose. The bill, Mr. Chairman, is simply to refer to the Court of Claims this case for the purpose of having the court consider the unpaid portion or residue of the awards heretofore made. It is not a question of interest; it is not a question of the Government paying interest to a private claimant, but it is for the purpose of the Government paying a portion of an award which has absolutely been made. And I might talk for a great length of time and I think I could not make it any plainer than that. I sincerely trust the gentleman will not object, but will let this matter go to the Court of Claims. The court can investigate the whole situation, and if a part of the award has not been paid and the Government still owes that portion of the award, the Government ought to pay it. It is not a question, as I stated a moment ago, of a private individual seeking to recover interest upon a claim against the Government, but a private individual seeking to recover a portion of an award given against the Government which has never been paid. And I hope the gentleman will allow the court to pass on it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course my information in regard to the bill comes from the report. In this case I know nothing whatever about the bill except from the report and general historical information which we all have in reference to the treaty under which we acquired Florida. I notice the report says that by the treaty of 1819 between Spain and the United States, by which Spain ceded Florida to the United States, the United States was obligated to make full satisfaction to the citizens of Spain for injuries by the unlawful operations of the American Army in Florida. Congress provided that these claims should be examined and adjusted by the judges of the courts of Florida, and the awards were made for the claimants. The judges allowed damages, and as a part of the damages they allowed interest on the value of the property destroyed.

The Treasury Department paid the face or principal value of the judgment, but refused to pay that part of the damages which was assessed as interest. This ruling was made by the then Secretary of the Treasury. It has frequently been followed by other Secretaries of the Treasury. Opinions of the Attorneys General, various ones, have been given, sustaining the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, though Daniel Webster, according to the report, thought that it should be paid. The question went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court decided that it was for the Treasury Department to determine. Now, the only claim they wish to refer to the Court of Claims is the right to recover interest on these awards. Of course, if there is any reason for the Government paying interest on the original awards, there is the same reason for our paying interest on the interest from 1819 down to date. There might be the same reason for compounding, although I will not say that. It might be quite a tidy sum by now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, this is not a claim for the interest on the awards.

Mr. MANN. That is what the report says it is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. Let me read what the report says. I think the gentleman must have been reading some other portion of the report. I read:

> In those cases in which awards were made for claims the judges allowed damages and, as part of the damages, interest on the value of the property destroyed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Which became a part of the awards

Mr. MANN. Well, that is interest.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There was no award until the court rendered its decision.

Mr. MANN. There was no legal award in that case at all.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We are not claiming the interest on the award.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is claiming interest on the value of the property which was destroyed. I read again from the report:

> The Treasury Department paid the face or principal value of these judgments, but refused to pay that part of the damages which was assessed as interest.

Now, I do not guarantee the correctness of the report, which I assume the gentleman from Florida had something to do with preparing.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I had not.

Mr. MANN. He should have had. In a complicated case like this a gentleman introducing a bill ought to see that the report is correct. That is what the report stated.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, I had seen the report before it was made.

Mr. MANN. The Treasury paid the principal of this judgment, but refused to pay that part which was assessed as interest. Is there any more reason why we should pay interest from 1819, when this property was destroyed, down to 1834 than there is why we should pay interest during the balance of the time? The interest on this sum, if compounded, whatever it was to begin with, would amount to quite a tidy sum. Now the gentleman proposes to send this to the Court of Claims in a way where the judgment has no chance at all. As the boys say, it "would not have a show for its white alley." It is fixed so that the Court of Claims would be required to enter judgment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if my friend will permit me——

Mr. MANN. I was trying to obtain information.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say this, if the gentleman will permit me—the record says this:

> By the treaty of 1819 Spain ceded Florida to the United States. The ninth article of that treaty obligated the United States to make full satisfaction to the citizens of Spain for the injuries by the unlawful operations of the American Army in Florida.

Now, the United States assumed that obligation to pay to the citizens of Spain the damages which had accrued to them by the unlawful operations of the American Army in Florida. These cases went to the courts of Florida, and in these cases in which the awards were made for claims the judges allowed damages, and, as part of the damages, interest on the value of the property destroyed.

Now, this was a question of two nations dealing with each other, not a question of a claim of a private citizen in the beginning as against the Government of the United States or any other Government. They were adjusting the claims of one nation as against the other, and the court, in construing this ninth article of the treaty, held that these parties were entitled, as a part of the damages, to interest up to the time that the awards were made.

Now, there is no pretense here of claiming interest on the awards that were made, but an accounting officer of the Treasury saw fit to eliminate the interest up to the time of the award and simply paid the principal amount of the damages, the actual value of the property, whatever it was.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the gentleman from Florida thinks these were judicial awards—judgments that were entered?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. These were awards made by the courts of Florida.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is in error.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Congress provided for the judges——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In these claims where awards were made to the claimants the judges allowed damages, and, as part of the damages, interest on the value of the property destroyed.

Mr. MANN. That is correct, that Congress provided in 1832 or 1834, or about that time——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In 1823 and in 1832 and 1834 it provided that the claims should be examined and adjusted by the judges of the courts of Florida named in the acts.

Mr. MANN. They could not render judgments. That was the very thing that the Supreme Court of the United States decided.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Supreme Court decided that they had no jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Supreme Court decided that the judges of the courts of Florida could not render judgments. They could make findings of fact; that those findings of fact were reviewable by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury, reviewing the findings of fact, allowed the face of the claim as awards.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And declined to allow the interest. Now, they took the case to the Supreme Court for the purpose of getting these awards declared to be judicial awards and not within the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Supreme Court decided against them. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Here are the French spoliation claims, arising under a treaty of 1803, I believe, with France, by which this country bound herself to pay the damages of our merchant-marine owners in the contests between this country and France. We have paid some of them. We have findings in a good many. Does the gentleman think that if we pay them we ought to pay interest on them? The cases are on all fours.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I think that if the Government of the United States establishes a tribunal to adjust claims of this character between one nation and another, which claims the United States assumes, the United States in all honor ought to be bound by the decisions of its own tribunal, created by itself, acting for it, having knowledge of all of the facts, and when that tribunal makes an award the United States ought surely to keep faith.

Mr. MANN. Agreeing with the gentleman entirely and finding that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the tribunal of last resort in this case was the Secretary of the Treasury and that we have paid all claims that the Secretary of the Treasury found to be due, why is not the gentleman willing to take that decision, which he says we ought to take?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman say the Supreme Court of the United States ever decided that this interest ought not to be paid up to the time of the award?

Mr. MANN. The Supreme Court never decided one way or the other about it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; they held that they had no jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. They held that it was within the control of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit me, a case involving the point was taken to the Supreme Court, which held that they had no jurisdiction of the matter. That was the case of the United States v. Ferreira (14 How., 40, 47).

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the gentleman is reading from.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am reading from the report.

Mr. MANN. They entertained jurisdiction of the case. They decided the case. To say that they had no jurisdiction of the case is idle.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am reading from the report.

Mr. MANN. They said they had no jurisdiction to render judgment, because it was a matter not for the courts, but for the administrative officers. Now, the gentleman seeks by an act of Congress to reverse that decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit, I am going to read all of this.

Mr. MANN. I hope not all of that decision.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; all of this paragraph of the report:

A case involving the point was taken to the Supreme Court, which held that it had no jurisdiction of the case. (U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How., 40, 47.) The court, however, proceeded to render an opinion in the case, holding that the power of revision and control had been vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. If the court had no jurisdiction in the case, then it would seem that any opinion it might give therein would be nothing more than a mere dicta and not law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is reading the opinion of an attorney now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am reading the report, with which I agree. Here is the Court of Claims, organized by the United States; and surely we can trust the Court of Claims to do ample and exact justice in this matter. These are old matters that have been hanging for years. There has been no laches on the part of these claimants, and I wish the gentleman would not object, but that he would let this matter go to the Court of Claims, and let that court say whether or not the Government, under the law, is bound to pay this part of the award, interest up to the time of the making of it, if the gentleman desires to call it interest, but no interest on the award itself. They held that that was a part of the measure of damages up to that time, and rendered the award accordingly. I think the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. It is really impossible——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Government can risk nothing by allowing this to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MANN. I am really becoming convinced that the gentleman from Florida is in earnest in urging this. I thought at first that it was pro forma.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am in earnest.

Mr. MANN. I am now convinced that the gentleman is in earnest.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have quite a number of constituents who have claims of this character.

Mr. MANN. They ought to put them in a basket with the French spoliation claims.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No. The gentleman must know that this question is by no means free from doubt. Here was Daniel Webster differing entirely from these accounting offices of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. I suppose he had the French spoliation claims in mind.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would rather take his legal opinion than that of some others. But be that as it may, it certainly envelops the whole situation in doubt, and these claimants will be here hammering at Congress for years and years to come unless a case like this can go to the Court of Claims to be judicially determined once and for all. I can not for the life of me see any possible objection to that.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman be willing to add to this bill a provision that the French spoliation claims should go to the Court of Claims with authority to render judgment?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That would simply mean to kill the bill. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I would not be in favor of doing it myself, if the gentleman would. Do not misunderstand me.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If those cases came here for a hearing I should expect to pass on them in view of the facts in the case. These are the facts in this case: These people believe they are entitled to this money. There is certainly doubt as to whether they are or not, and I believe this great Government ought to be fair in this matter.

I think there is too much of a disposition in the House to attempt here to keep the courts of the country from passing on claims against the Government. I want to say that the Government of the United States ought to do what the Government requires the citizens of this country to do. A citizen of the country is forced into court. He must abide by its decision. Here are a great number of cases dependent on the settlement of this one principle. What harm can there be to allow the Government to go into its own court with its own citizens and determine the question as to liability once and for all? The Government ought to do right when the Government expects the citizens of the country to do right.

Mr. MANN. If the Government was not a soft mark such a statement as the gentleman from Florida makes would not be made. Anybody who can sue a citizen can sue the Government, except in a case of fraud. But in this case, where you can not sue a citizen under similar conditions, then the people want special legislation to get into the Court of Claims against the Government. There would be no suit here lie against a citizen if this were a matter between two citizens.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Why not?

Mr. MANN. You can bring a suit in the Court of Claims now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And run up against the statute of limitations.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but that is not all. If it was between two citizens and the matter had been delegated for adjudication to one of the officers of the Covernment and he had decided it, that would end it as to the citizen. But not so as to the Government. Here is a case where the Supreme Court has decided against the people, where several Secretaries of the Treasury have decided against them, where several Attorneys General of the United States have decided against them, and yet my friend from Florida says this Government ought to treat them as well as citizens. If this had been between two citizens there never would have been but one decision, and yet they have had half a dozen decisions or more already.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman name a Supreme Court decision where they have decided against the payment of these claims?

Mr. MANN. I did not say that. It went to the Supreme Court and the court decided against you and said it was a matter for the Secretary of the Treasury to determine. Several Secretaries of the Treasury have decided against these claimants.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But the award had been rendered in their favor. How does the gentleman get rid of the award?

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman ever read the award?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Suppose two individuals agree to arbitrate a matter, solemnly enter into it under the statutory regulation, and the award is made under that arbitration, would not the gentleman think that the parties were bound by it; would not they be held to it?

Mr. MANN. That is not this case. In this case they made a finding as the Court of Claims makes findings every day as to the value of property taken. It did not take any brains to say that interest ought or should not amount to so much.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman answer this question?

Mr. MANN. I will if I can, although I am not on the witness stand in this case.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. At whose instance were these awards made; who provided the tribunal?

Mr. MANN. Congress provided that these people could go to the courts in Florida and have the findings made, but the court could not render judgment; it was simply to make findings. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that they were not awards.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman point out the decision and the name of it?

Mr. MANN. I will read from the report:

The fact that these claims are old should not militate against them if they are just. That they are just has been frequently held by committees of Congress. The main question in issue, or one of the questions, has been whether the findings of the judges who were given jurisdiction to hear the cases were judicial awards or whether they were mere administrative findings, subject to the supervisory authority of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. On what page of the report?

Mr. MANN. Page 2 of the report. The gentleman ought to be as familiar with it as I am. I am reading from the second complete paragraph from the top, on page 2.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Daniel Webster when Attorney General held strongly that they were judicial awards.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. He and the Supreme Court did not agree.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Supreme Court did not pass upon that. Will the gentleman read where it did?

Mr. MANN. I have read it three times from the report of the House committee. I do not guarantee whether the report is correct or not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will show me where the Supreme Court has decided that question, I will withdraw.

Mr. MANN. I have shown the gentleman where the committee claims that the court decided it. I do not think the gentleman from Florida or myself has examined the Supreme Court opinion.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have not.

Mr. MANN. I have not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Neither of us know anything about it except what we get from the report; but I do know that the Congress of the United States fixed this tribunal of Florida judges to adjudicate and adjust this matter, and they found what was due and declared what was due; but the accounting officer of the Treasury eliminated a portion of it, and now we are simply asking nothing but to go to the Court of Claims to determine whether it is just or not.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the regular order. The gentlemen ought not to take up the whole day with just one case when there are so many meritorious cases on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

EDWARD A. THOMPSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7287) for the relief of Edward A. Thompson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Edward A. Thompson, to compensate him for the loss of his son, Harold A. Thompson, late a seaman on the U. S. S. Georgia, who was killed in the performance of his duty on said ship.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 5 strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$125.40." In line 6, after the word "Thompson," strike out the remainder of said bill and substitute the following words: "and said Edward A. Thompson shall be regarded as the duly designated beneficiary of the late Harold A. Thompson, a seaman on the U. S. S. Illinois, who was killed in the performance of his duty on said ship."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the committee if it is the intention where the law does not provide for payment as a beneficiary who is dependent to always report special bills? If so, what is the object of having the law in relation to the Army and Navy provide that people shall be dependent in order to get this sum? Here is a case where the law provides that on the death of a man in the Navy his father or mother, dependent upon him, shall receive six months' pay if he designates some one as a beneficiary. Several times where the man has failed to designate a beneficiary we have ordered the payment of the money, but in this case the father frankly admits that he was not dependent upon the boy, but it is proposed to pay him as though he were. Of course, that is a nice thing, but what is the object in having the law?

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about the matter except what appears in the report.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, it is true that the law is such that payment can not be made except where the beneficiary is dependent. The father of this boy, who was killed while performing his duty on board ship, is not dependent and never was dependent upon that boy. He is a man in ordinary circumstances. It appears to me that this is a mighty small award for the loss of a son, yet the committee saw fit to make the award.

I do not know what the policy of the committee is, because I am not a member of it. I simply know the fact, as the father very honestly stated that he was not dependent upon his son, and that his son lost his life in the service of the Government.

Mr. MANN. We have changed the law so that now the beneficiary is not required to be dependent. The boy can name the father or the mother as the beneficiary without any evidence to show that either was dependent. But this bill is considered by unanimous consent. Is this committee amendment satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. It is not satisfactory to me, for I think an award of $125 for the loss of a son is a mighty small one.

Mr. MANN. I do not mean if it is wholly satisfactory, but whether the gentleman is going to resist it.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I will not resist it, as it is the customary six months' pay award, though I think there should be a much larger amount given.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, without going into any lengthy discussion of the matter, I will state that I have had matters very similar to this upon several occasions, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

RICHARD RIGGLES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13728) for the relief of Richard Riggles.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Richard Riggles, in full payment for injuries sustained by him on the 6th day of February, 1885, while in the discharge of his duties at the navy yard, Washington, resulting in the loss of his right leg.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 5 strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$500.80."

In line 9, after the word "leg," strike out the period, substitute a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, That no agent, attorney, firm of attorneys, or any persons engaged heretofore or hereafter in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting this claim shall, directly or indirectly, receive or retain for such service in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim, or for any act whatsoever in connection with this claim, any fee or compensation whatsoever."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let me see if I understand it. Here is a man who was working in the Washington Navy Yard at $1.60 per day. He lost his leg, and as a result of that he is now working in the navy yard at the rate of $3.28 a day. That probably does not compensate him for the loss of his leg. If he gets paid this sum, they may consider themselves justified in discharging him. He is already getting more than twice as much pay without the leg as he did before with the leg.

Mr. POU. But he has not got his leg back.

Mr. MANN. No; but he has gotten consideration from the Government because of the loss of his leg.

Mr. POU. We thought in view of the fact that he was injured without any fault on his part that the man ought to have some compensation, and that is all there is to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH A. POWERS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11594) for the relief of James A. Powers.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $312.17 as compensation to James A. Powers, a letter carrier in the city of New York N. Y., for loss of salary and for medical services resulting from injuries received by him on February 23, 1912, from the breaking of a stool which he was using in his employment.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 5 strike out the figures "$312.17" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$256.17." In line 5, after the word "to," strike out the words "James A. Powers" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Joseph A. Powers."

In line 7, after the word "salary," strike out the words "and for medical services."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Joseph A. Powers."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask one question in reference to this amendment. The amendment limits the reason for the amount which is to be paid to compensation for loss of salary while in the hospital. Is it intended by the committee to leave this open so that the man may hereafter have another bill brought for injury, hospital charges, and surgeons' bills, or is it intended that this sum is in full payment of all that the Government ought to pay?

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, it is intended as full discharge of any possible obligation that the Government might be under in the premises.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN P. EHRMANN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13591) for the relief of John P. Ehrmann.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $520.50 to John P. Ehrmann, in full of all claims he may have against the Government for injuries received by him while employed by the United States as foreman, gun shop, Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y., for loss of salary, hospital charges, and surgeon bills resulting from said injuries.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 6 strike out the figures "$520.50" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$245.50."

In line 6, after the name "Ehrmann," strike out remainder of said bill and add the following words: "for loss of salary while in hospital suffering from injuries received by him while employed by the United States as foreman, gun shop, Watervliet Arsenal, N. Y."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

H. E. JOHNSON ET AL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was House resolution 551, referring the bill H. R. 1049 to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 551.

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 1049) for the relief of H. E. Johnson, John F. Shelley, Jane M. Johnson, and Duff Quinn, with the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there are several of these resolutions on the calendar. Does the gentleman from Idaho think it would be doing anybody a favor to refer to the Court of Claims a claim for $25 for a resident of Idaho?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, these claims will be considered as one, the total amount being upward of $600. Of course, personally I would much prefer to see the bill introduced passed instead of the resolution, but there is a desire on the part of the committee to secure a finding of facts in the case, and so the committee reported the resolution in lieu of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Has the Reclamation Service made any report on this?

Mr. FRENCH. This is a matter that is directly under the Indian Department, because the Indian Department has——

Mr. MANN. Well, has the irrigation service in the Indian Office made any report?

Mr. FRENCH. I understand so.

Mr. MANN. What do they say?

Mr. FRENCH. I understand the facts are such as to substantiate the bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, if this is a matter that must be in the end really determined by the Government administrative officers, here is an irrigation service either in the Indian Office or the Reclamation Service that overflows land and a claim is made for $25 that is to be referred to the Court of Claims in Washington.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, as I say, I much prefer that the bill be passed instead of the resolution, but I yielded to it with the belief that the entire amount of the claims will be considered as one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF STEAMER "HANCOCK."

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16717) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain moneys to the officers and crew of the steamer Hancock or their legal representatives.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named members of the crew of the steamer Hancock or their legal representatives the sums set opposite their respective names: E. S. Wheeler, $162.81; Bamlet Kent, $114.87; Charles L. Wilson, $193.61; A. R. Crook, $248.81; John H. Sanner, $111.55; George Simpson, $101.01; Ellery Dewitt, $71.53; Harlow N. Davock, $29.16; David Tindall, $83.20; together with interest thereon from August 16, 1905.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, strike out lines 8, 9, and 10, and on page 2, strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, down to the word "five," and insert the following: "E. S. Wheeler, $142.31; Bamley Kent, $83.87; Charles L. Wilson, $118.72; A. R. Crook, $160.13; John H. Sanner, $70.07; George Simpson, $63.26; Ellery Dewitt, $45.78; Harlow N. Davock, $19.04; David Tindall, $49.32; said payments being in the nature of relief for losses sustained through the sinking of the U. S. S. Hancock on the 16th day of August, 1905."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, as I understand the case, and if I am in error I wish to be corrected, these men were serving upon a vessel of the engineers in the War Department. They had a collision with a steamer called the Hancock. A suit was brought by the Government against the owners of the Hancock, and the suit was settled so that the Hancock owners paid half the loss, including the loss to the Government employees on the Government vessel, and that that money they have received.

Mr. POU. That is correct, only the steamer was named the Binghamton.

Mr. MANN. These men hired an expensive attorney—possibly not an expensive attorney—and now seek to have the Government pay the other half of the loss as well as their attorney fees. In the first place, Mr. E. S. Wheeler's loss was $41. His proportion of the attorney's fees was $121.81, and he wants us to pay the total amount. His loss was $41. He has got half of that already. His attorney's fees were $121.80, and he wants us to pay $142.31. That is the way I understand the case. Is that correct?

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman is correct, in a measure. The amount specified in the bill is one-half the loss sustained by the members of the crew.

Mr. MANN. That is just what I just stated.

Mr. DOREMUS. And their proportionate share of the attorney's fees which they contributed. I will state to my friend from Illinois that this attorney was employed by the interveners with the consent and approval and, if I am not mistaken, upon the recommendation of the district attorney. The interveners paid the attorney out of their own pockets, and the attorney practically conducted the case on behalf of the Government.

Mr. MANN. The attorney did what?

Mr. DOREMUS. Conducted the case practically on behalf of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Well, he should get paid, then, through the Department of Justice.

Mr. DOREMUS. But they could not get paid through the Department of Justice for the loss.

Mr. MANN. Now, the total loss, to begin with, of all of these men, on their own statement, was $715. They recovered half of this. They paid $395 for a special attorney, and there remains unpaid $357.50.

Mr. DOREMUS. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Wheeler is a United States assistant engineer, or was, who recommended the payment of this claim. That is the way we get it.

Mr. DOREMUS. The payment of this claim has been recommended by the Chief Engineer of the Army——

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. And by the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and all others who have to do with it.

Mr. MANN. To start with, Mr. Wheeler had lost $41. He had an attorney's fee of $121.81. If I had been in Mr. Wheeler's place, I would have pocketed the loss——

Mr. DOREMUS. I do not know what part he played in this matter.

Mr. MANN. I am only reading from his statement, and I have not raised any question about his veracity at all.

Mr. DOREMUS. The fact is that these men suffered the loss through no fault of their own. They paid the attorney fee with the consent and approval of the Department of Justice. So what good reason can exist for not reimbursing them?

Mr. MANN. This reason exists: If this was a suit the Department of Justice had anything to do with, the Department of Justice should have attended to it, and I think they did. And if the Department of Justice had any authority to hire an outside attorney, it had authority to pay him.

Mr. DOREMUS. Well, I would not say positively that they hired him, but I know that the attorney was engaged in behalf of the interveners with the consent and approval of the district attorney's office, and that the attorney whom they engaged practically prosecuted the case against the owners of the Binghamton on the part of the men.

Mr. MANN. Here was a case where there was no liability on the part of the Government at all. Nobody pretends there was. Certain people suffered loss. They brought suit against the people who were liable. They settled that suit for less than they said their damages were, and then turn around and want the United States, which was not liable in the first instance, to pay them more than it would have paid if it had paid the full claim that they made in the first instance against other parties.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman has no right to assume that there is no liability at all on the part of the Government.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not claim there was any liability?

Mr. DOREMUS. This case was prosecuted against the owners of the Binghamton.

Mr. MANN. Yes. But the Government was not liable. The Government did not own the Binghamton.

Mr. DOREMUS. The owners of the Binghamton claimed there was negligence on the part of the Government. Now, the question of negligence was never judicially determined, but the suit was compromised.

Mr. MANN. But if there had been negligence on the part of the Government, the Government would not have been liable to the very men who were negligent. These men were operating the boats. They were the men who had that collision.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman assumes, in his argument, that the gentlemen named in this bill are the responsible parties in that they were negligent. There is no proof in the record or in the report to bear him out.

Mr. MANN. I think there is. The man who was in charge was the United States assistant engineer. He was the chief officer there.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit, the report ought to show the exact relations they bore to this vessel, because that would determine absolutely the question which is in the mind of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to my friend from Mississippi that the question of negligence was never judicially determined. After the case was tried, and before a final determination, the parties got together and compromised by the owners of the Binghamton paying one-half of the loss.

Mr. MANN. This claim covers the officers and men on board Government vessels.

Mr. DOREMUS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Of course there was only liability on the part of the Government, whether they were or were not negligent. If anybody was negligent they were negligent. I will say to the gentleman that under the precedent we could pay to the men one-half of the loss. They have already recovered the other half, but under the precedent which Congress has followed for years it will not pay attorneys' fees.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. Certainly, I will object. If I did not object 40 other men here would do so, unless it is reduced to the amount of the actual loss.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PATRICK J. FITZGERALD, DECEASED.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13350) for the relief of the widow and heirs at law of Patrick J. Fitzgerald, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the widow and heirs at law of Patrick J. Fitzgerald, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000, in full compensation for the death of said Patrick J. Fitzgerald, on January 3, 1907, caused by injuries received on December 31, 1906, while employed as a chain maker, fourth class, in the navy yard of the United States at Boston, Mass.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5.000" and insert "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

THOMAS C. HYDE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11158) for the relief of Thomas C. Hyde.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass this bill over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What does that mean; to pass over without prejudice?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. POU. I do not want it to appear that there was any objection to the consideration of the bill, because there is some additional information which the gentleman would like to give.

Mr. MANN. Just pass it, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be passed over, and retain its place on the calander.

There was no objection.

GEORGE T. LARKIN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 305) for the relief of George T. Larkin.

The bill, with committee amendments, was read in full.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

WICKLIFF FRY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10025) for the relief of Wickliff Fry, for horse lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $185 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay Wickliff Fry, a citizen of Delroy, Carroll County, in the State of Ohio, in compensation for one horse owned by him and which lost its life while hired by the United States Geological Survey.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, line 3, by striking out "$185" and inserting "$135."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this bill was ever referred to the Interior Department? It is for the loss of a horse hired by a couple of men in the Geological Survey, who deliberately hitched the horse in a place where no man who knew anything about horseflesh would fail to know that it would kill the horse, and it did. Now, does the department recommend that the Government pay this, instead of the employees?

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that it was referred to the Geological Survey.

Mr. MANN. Here is a statement from the report. It says:

The testimony of Mr. Fry and two witnesses who were with him immediately upon hearing that the horse was dead was to the effect that the place where they hitched this horse was boggy, and that the horse had mired up to his body, and that in the struggle had been choked to death; that the rope by which he had been tied had been tied around his neck and had not been placed through the bridle ring, and claim that if ordinary care had been exercised in the care of this horse he would not have been killed.

That is perfectly patent to anybody who knows enough to drive a horse or hitch it. If the Geological Survey wants to send out men who know nothing about hitching a horse, either as to the method of hitching or the place of hitching, they ought to so report.

Mr. POU. The committee thought that the owner of the horse ought not to suffer.

Mr. MANN. The owner of the horse ought not to suffer. He ought to sue these men.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MICHAEL F. O'HARE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6530) for the relief of Michael F. O'Hare.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Michael F. O'Hare, of Tyngsboro, Mass., the sum of $200, in full compensation for loss of cow and injury to his business through negligence on the part of employees of the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Entomology, on June 11, 1911.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, line 7, by striking out "$200" and inserting "$85."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what were the facts of this case?

Mr. POU. I will say to my friend from Mississippi that I know nothing about it except what appears in the report.

Mr. SISSON. It says:

Some days after Dr. Harris called at the office, Mr. O'Hare came in and told of the death of the cow and asked what we could do in reimbursing him for the loss of the animal. I expressed my regret concerning his loss and told him he had better see his Congressman, Butler Ames, of Lowell, and ask him to introduce a bill for relief.

How did the Agricultural Department get hold of the cow? How did it become liable for the loss of this cow?

Well, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection. I notice here that the employees of the Agricultural Department left some arsenate of lead exposed and the cow got hold of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

LOUIS JONES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13483) for the relief of Louis Jones.

The bill was read, with committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

FRED HENDERSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13482) for the relief of Fred Henderson.

The bill was read, with committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

FEED LARSEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the resolution (H. Res. 552) to refer H. R. 1052, a bill for the relief of Fred Larsen, to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House resolution 552.

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 1052) for the relief of Fred Larsen, with the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the question arises on account of a reservoir site and lands that were owned, or rather entered, by Fred Larsen being taken by the Government in the construction of a reservoir in connection with an irrigation system. There is a difference between Mr. Larsen and the Government as to the value of the property destroyed, Mr. Larsen claiming that he was damaged to the amount of $4,700 and the department raising not only the question as to the amount of damages, but also raising the question of entryman's rights to the land; raising the question of whether or not he had forfeited his rights to the land. Altogether it seems a question, in view of the conflicting report of the department and the evidence submitted by Mr. Larsen, that should go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MANN. This is just for a finding of fact?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; simply for a finding of fact and conclusions of law. This case and the next one are alike, and they arise from the same irrigation project.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, in the securing of these rights in reservoir sites the Government agrees with the claimants upon what damages there shall be?

Mr. FRENCH. Ordinarily, yes; and most of the claims were settled.

Mr. FOSTER. When they are not settled, and there is disagreement, how is it managed—by referring it to the Court of Claims?

Mr. FRENCH. Ordinarily not. Here is a case, however, where the Government has taken the position, apparently, that these entrymen have not complied with the law sufficiently to acquire title to the lands in order to be entitled to damages. Now, there is a question there.

Mr. FOSTER. They were paid damages?

Mr. FRENCH. No. This man has been paid no damages.

Mr. FOSTER. He held this land as a homestead site?

Mr. FRENCH. He had taken it as a homestead entry.

Mr. FOSTER. He had entered upon the land?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; he had entered upon the land, and had made improvements. His affidavit in evidence sets forth that he is damaged to the extent of $4,700. The department's report is adverse, raising not only the question of the amount of damages, but the title that this man may have to the land itself; and I think under the circumstances it is a very fair case to go to the Court of Claims for the finding of facts.

Mr. FOSTER. Have they had other cases of this kind?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know. Most of the cases, I will say, were determined by the Government and the settlers through a representative of the department being sent there.

Mr. FOSTER. To settle what damages there were?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; to settle and arrange a basis for payment.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the claim here? Did the department set up a claim that it was an illegal entry for a homestead?

Mr. FRENCH. Rather that the entryman had not complied with the law. Mr. Larson did not see the representative of the department at all. In fact, both Mr. Larson and Mr. Anderson were in that situation. Neither one of them saw the representative of the department at all, and consequently did not present the facts in the cases to the representative of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this to ascertain whether the damages are well founded?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

PETER W. ANDERSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the resolution (H. Res. 553) to refer H. R. 1051, a bill for the relief of Peter W. Anderson, to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House resolution 553.

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 1051) for the relief of Peter W. Anderson, with the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for the finding of facts and conclusions of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EUGENE A. FREUND AND ALFRED F. ROEMMICH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10475) for the relief of Eugene A. Freund and Alfred F. Roemmich.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

GATTLEIB SCHLECT AND OTHERS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5058) for the relief of Gattleib Schlect and Maurice D. Higgins, and for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Bindhammer and Valentine Brasch.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

MATTHEW LOGAN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3761) for the relief of Matthew Logan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Matthew Logan shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Battery H, First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteer Light Artillery, on the 25th day of July, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANNIE E. WHITE AND HEIRS OF PATRICK WHITE, DECEASED.

The next bill in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13257) for the relief of Annie E. White and the heirs of Patrick White, deceased.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for just a moment?

Mr. MANN. I will, but I will renew it.

Mr. HAYDEN. This is a most meritorious measure. It is an attempt to do justice to one who has been greviously wronged by the military authorities of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Oh, this is not a bill that can pass by unanimous consent. I do not think it would pass if I could get a few minutes in the House to explain it. It is a little older than the hills and not quite as old as some of the mountains and never had any merit in it.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman from Illinois intends to object, it is, of course, useless to delay the consideration of other bills by discussing the matter at this time, although I do not at all agree with the statement that he has just made. If a suitable opportunity is given me I believe that I can convince a majority of the Members of this House that Mrs. White is entitled to this relief.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HUNTON ALLEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17424) for the relief of Hunton Allen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Hunton Allen, the postmaster at Williamson, in the State of Georgia, with the sum of $237.16, the amount and value of postage stamps stolen from said post office by a burglar on May 13, 1913, without any fault on the part of said Allen; and said amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

CLARA DOUGHERTY AND OTHERS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 23) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the terms and provisions of the act of Congress approved April 22, 1904, entitled "An act to provide for payment of damages on account of change of grade due to construction of the Union Station, in the District of Columbia," as amended by the act of Congress approved June 29, 1906, the commission appointed under said act is hereby authorized and directed to meet and view the property known as lots Nos. 13 and 41 and the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all in square No. 724, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, improved by premises Nos. 323, 325, 327, 329, and 337 First Street NE., city of Washington, D. C., and hear testimony touching the damages to said property which have resulted from changes in the grade of streets, avenues, or alleys authorized by the act of Congress Approved February 28, 1903, relating to the construction of a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and to appraise and determine the amount of damages, if any, to which the owner of said property so affected by change of grade may be entitled.

SEC. 2. That if any of the parties interested, their personal representatives, or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall be dissatisfied with the appraisement or award of said commission the court shall, on motion of the parties so dissatisfied, direct the United States marshal to summon a jury of seven disinterested men, not related to any person in interest, to meet and view the said property and to appraise and determine the amount of damages to which the owner of said property so affected by change of grade may be entitled, as provided in and by the aforesaid act of Congress so amended as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That a sufficient sum to pay the compensation and expenses of said commission and the compensation of said jurors and the amount of any appraisement or award of damages made in favor of the owner of said property is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, and 50 per cent thereof shall be refunded to said District of Columbia by the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the words "and forty-one."

Page 3, line 18, after the words "United States" insert: "Provided however, That from such sum or sums as may be awarded to said owners there shall be deducted the compensation and expenses of said commission and the compensation of said jurors.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this bill comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The only point in the case, as I understand it, is that the statute of limitations has run against these people.

Mr. COADY. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Did they have proper notice?

Mr. COADY. There was notification by publication only in the Washington newspapers.

Mr. SISSON. Was there no personal service?

Mr. COADY. No. One of the women, Mrs. Meder, a very poor woman, is a charwoman in one of the departments here. She testified that she rarely read the newspapers and never read the legal notices, and that was substantially the testimony of the others.

Mr. SISSON. There was no personal service on these parties?

Mr. COADY. No personal service at all.

Mr. SISSON. Service by publication only?

Mr. COADY. Service by publication only.

Mr. MANN. Why does the House committee propose to strike out lot 41?

Mr. COADY. For the reason at the hearing it appeared that the owner of that lot has since sold it. It was a vacant and unimproved lot.

Mr. MANN. Sold it before or after this bill passed the Senate?

Mr. COADY. I think he sold it before the bill was introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

RATHBUN, BEACHY & CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2312) for the relief of Rathbun, Beachy & Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Rathbun, Beachy & Co., of Webster, S. Dak., the sum of $1,000, in full compensation for loss in sale of cattle illegally placed in quarantine by Government inspector at the stockyards in Chicago, Ill., and said amount is hereby appropriated.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$975."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I think this bill ought to have some explanation. As I understand it, these people shipped these cattle to Chicago without their being inspected, and then they were put in a pen from which they were afterwards sold at a loss, and this represents the loss. Is that it?

Mr. POU. Dr. Galloway, Acting Secretary of Agriculture, says:

I may say in this connection that the cattle in question were placed in quarantine through error, and from all the circumstances in the case the claim appears to be a just one.

Mr. FOSTER. They were shipped to Chicago without first being inspected, and the authorities at Chicago were so notified; and then they were placed in this pen, were they not?

Mr. DILLON. They were uninspected cattle at the time of shipment, and they reached Chicago in the middle of the night and were put into infected pens under the order of Dr. Dyson, and they were then forced to be sold for immediate slaughter. The committee has fixed the lowest estimate of the damages.

Mr. FOSTER. But they were shipped there as uninspected cattle.

Mr. DILLON. Yes; under the regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. And then, of course, they had to go into quarantine when they got there.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. DILLON. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. All cattle are inspected when they come to the market at Chicago, and not at the point from which they are shipped.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I was trying to get at. In reading the bill I judge that they arrived there and were not inspected; that there was no inspection made.

Mr. DILLON. Oh, yes there was; but not in the middle of the night, when they arrived. They were inspected in the morning, and the inspector's report was favorable. There was no disease and no objection to the shipment of any character, but they were placed through mistake in the quarantine pen, and they were sacrificed and sold for immediate slaughter.

Mr. FOSTER. Whose mistake was it?

Mr. DILLON. Dr. Dyson; he ordered them to be placed there.

Mr. FOSTER. For what reason?

Mr. DILLON. He misinterpreted the instructions that had been received. The instructions were applicable to Colorado, but he interpreted them to mean Chicago. It was the only instance of the kind. Secretary Wilson investigated it and ordered them to be released from quarantine, but they had to be sold at a sacrifice.

Mr. FOSTER. They were cattle sent in for slaughter?

Mr. DILLON. No; they were sent in to sell for feeders, but they had to be sold for slaughter, and hence the loss.

Mr. SISSON. How do you arrive at the amount of the loss? It is an uncertain amount.

Mr. DILLON. There were various estimates. One company received four carloads and another company received six carloads, and the estimates ran from $1,000 up to $2000. The department admits in one of its communications that there is a liability to the extent of $975 to $1,000, and the committee has adopted the lowest amount mentioned by the department.

Mr. SISSON. It is, of course, a difficult matter to determine what might or might not happen to a carload of cattle placed on the market, nor is it fair to compare it and show what other carloads of cattle would bring. You might have a dozen carloads of cattle from some farm and one carload would bring a great deal more than another carload of cattle.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, my information is—I do not know anything about this particular case except from the report—that these cattle were placed in a diseased pen, but not sufficiently diseased to order their destruction, and they would sell for about 75 cents a hundred less than they would sell if they were not put in that pen.

Mr. SISSON. Is it absolutely certain that they would bring less?

Mr. MANN. It is absolutely certain that when they go into that pen they bring a less amount of money. There is no question about that.

Mr. SISSON. There is no question but that the buyer might take advantage of the situation.

Mr. MANN. I hope some day I can take the gentleman through the stockyards.

Mr. SISSON. I have been through them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that they do not spend much time in buying a few cattle; they buy them in the pen. They do not move them until they are purchased. These cattle were put in the pen where they would bring a smaller amount of money. They could not get them out of the pen anywhere else without killing them.

Mr. POU. They were ordered slaughtered prematurely anyway.

Mr. MANN. They could not get them out of the quarantine pen except by killing them.

Mr. SISSON. That is an unusual sort of a claim. Have there been any claims of this kind before?

Mr. DILLON. I never knew of any.

Mr. SISSON. This case may become a precedent for a great many losses.

Mr. DILLON. I will state that this was the only case under this mistaken order, as is clearly shown in the records of the department.

Mr. SISSON. Was there no way in which the Government could have these orders communicated so that advantage might not be taken of them? In other words, are we not opening up a possible opportunity for a great many damage claims of this kind in the enforcement of this law?

Mr. DILLON. I do not know; possibly other cases might arise, but in reference to this one order this is the only case in which an error was committed.

Mr. SISSON. What method was pursued by these people to determine this loss; what evidence did they have?

Mr. DILLON. We had an affidavit, which is set out in the report of the committee specifying the amount of damages. The amount of damages would be the difference between the value of the cattle if sold for feeders and if sold for slaughter. That is the measure of damages.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that I think they arrived at it by taking the probable value of that class of cattle that day.

Mr. DILLON. Yes; and the committee took the lowest estimate.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi that this amount ranges from $975 to $2,000, and the bill carries the minimum amount.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the question of unliquidated damages is always a difficult one to arrive at. How many of these cattle were put in the pen?

Mr. DILLON. All of them; the entire 10 carloads.

Mr. SISSON. Making up how many cattle?

Mr. DILLON. Something over 100, I think.

Mr. SISSON. What grade of cattle?

Mr. DILLON. They were feeders shipped for that express purpose to put on the market as feeders, but they were compelled to be sold for slaughter.

Mr. SISSON. They were sent there to be fed and fattened.

Mr. DILLON. They were shipped there to be sold as feeders.

Mr. SISSON. Then they were sold as canners. That would be about $10 loss on each animal, and if there was 100 that would be $1,000.

Mr. DILLON. We took the lowest estimate.

Mr. POU. We took the department's figures.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not quite understand yet why these cattle could not have been sold for feeders.

Mr. DILLON. Under the quarantine rules they were not permitted to be sold.

Mr. FOWLER. They were put in a quarantine pen through mistake. Why could not the mistake have been corrected and then the cattle sold as feeders instead of for slaughter?

Mr. DILLON. The trouble about that was that the purchasers took advantage of that situation, and the consignors could not order them to be shipped back, and they had to go on the immediate market.

Mr. FOWLER. Who placed them in the quarantine pen?

Mr. DILLON. It was done under the order of the superintendent of the stock yards.

Mr. FOWLER. And that was under the authority of the United States?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Was it not made known to the United States that these cattle were not subject to quarantine?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And that was done at the time, was it not?

Mr. DILLON. Yes; by telegraphic order to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FOWLER. And then they were released, were they not?

Mr. DILLON. They were ordered to be released, but held for immediate slaughter.

Mr. FOWLER. And there was no authority on the part of the United States to direct what should be done with the cattle, was there?

Mr. DILLON. Oh, yes; under the quarantine regulations.

Mr. FOWLER. Did the United States direct that they should be slaughtered?

Mr. DILLON. Yes; sold for immediate slaughter. They were in the quarantine pen; that is, the infected pen.

Mr. FOWLER. But does the fact that they were placed in the quarantine pen absolutely pass judgment on them that they must be slaughtered?

Mr. DILLON. Oh, yes.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the first time that I ever heard of such an unreasonable rule.

Mr. DILLON. They were exposed, and hence must be sold for immediate slaughter.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman mean that they were exposed to other cattle that were diseased, and that because of that fact they were sold for immediate slaughter?

Mr. DILLON. That is an infected pen, and they are thus exposed.

Mr. FOWLER. Were there any other cattle in there that were diseased?

Mr. DILLON. There had been.

Mr. POU. It is just like a man being put in the pesthouse.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the shipper of these cattle was absolutely at the mercy of the inspector or official of the Department of Agriculture, and these cattle were put in this quarantine pen by his direction and order. Subsequently it was found that they were not infected cattle and should not have been put there, and they were sold for slaughter at a reduced price over what they would have brought if sold when they arrived as feeders.

Mr. FOWLER. As I understand, these are about the facts: The cattle, through mistake, were put in the quarantine pen?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And afterwards it was found that they were placed there through mistake, and they were released?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And that simply because they had been placed in the quarantine pen they were then sold for slaughter, and the gentleman says that the buyers took advantage of that condition and bought at a less price?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Naturally.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the condition, is it not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not understand that they were released as feeders. They were released for slaughter, and they had to be sold for slaughtering purposes. There were 10 cars of cattle, and the weight is given at 205,160 pounds.

Mr. FOWLER. It does not make any difference about the size, or anything of that kind, if they were healthy cattle. I have been on the market myself with cattle and hogs and sheep and everything else that I could buy and put on the market, and I have always had control over my cattle and hogs when on the market, and if put in pens that I did not like, I have had them transferred to another pen and sold under my order, and not under the order of somebody else.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am telling the gentleman what happened in this case, and the Secretary himself, who had the matter brought to his attention, immediately ordered the cattle released, and, as is stated in the report, there is no question but that the owner of the cattle ought to have redress from somebody, and I do not know who it would be unless it be the United States.

Mr. FOWLER. If the owner of the cattle has a herd of cattle which is sound and without disease, there is no right on the part of anybody to condemn the cattle without some good reason for it, and if a mistake has been made, the only thing that can be done is to right that mistake and release the cattle, if they have been unjustly impounded in some pen or somewhere else where they ought not to have been placed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman, of course, knows that detaining these cattle as infected or diseased cattle for a day necessarily affected their market value?

Mr. FOWLER. Probably there might have been a drift for a day. I know that cattle drift considerably in shipping.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say that has already been stated, that the amount of damage was estimated as high as $2,000, and the lowest amount of the damage is placed at $975, the amount allowed by the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. I have heard that; but that is not the question that I am after. After a wrong has been done, I do not understand why that wrong can not be righted with a sound, healthy herd, because I have been on the market myself with cattle, as I say.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Can the gentleman conceive how you could right a wrong after the cattle have been placed in quarantine, even if they were released the next day?

Mr. FOWLER. The amount of damages that I get from the gentleman's statement is that they have been kept for one day unjustly in quarantine.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And for that reason they were deprived of sale during that day.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No; that is not the point.

Mr. FOWLER. And that is the amount of damage from the gentleman's statement; that is all I can see.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman does not see the point.

Mr. FOWLER. But I do see the point.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It changed the character of the cattle.

Mr. FOWLER. I know that you can have a stigma placed on yourself or on an animal by unjust treatment. I know that is true; and if the cattle were placed within a quarantine pen it was unjust to the cattle, and the owner had a right to complain, and I suppose did so; and he had the cattle released from that stigma.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Was not their value affected by that?

Mr. FOWLER. It is probable that the cattle were unjustly treated. I could not say about that.

Mr. HAY. As I understand the point of the case, it is this: The cattle were placed in an infected pen, and having been placed in an infected pen, under the regulations of the United States quarantine laws they had to be sold and butchered immediately.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand any such doctrine as that. I have never run up against such a ruling as that since I have been on the market.

Mr. HAY. But that is the law, and those people who owned the cattle suffered from the application of that law to their cattle, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. FOWLER. If the conditions were as have been stated here, the fact that they were placed in a quarantine pen did not change the condition of the cattle. In other words, the quarantine pen is a pen where cattle are placed in order to be inspected. That is its purpose.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman understands the case yet. These cattle were sent there to be marketed as feeders.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand the situation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, by placing them in the quarantine pen they had to be sold and slaughtered when they were released, and consequently the owner of the cattle had to take a less price for them than he would have received if they had been sold as feeders.

Mr. FOWLER. I know that statement was made here, and I do not understand the statement to correspond with the regulations.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The statement is substantiated by the correspondence of the department and never has been questioned, and the only question apparently there was in the case was to determine the amount of damage, and the Committee on Claims took the lowest estimate and inserted it. I know the gentleman with his large business experience and his experience in handling live stock will see that the manner in which 10 cars of cattle—243 head in numbers—were handled in this instance, that $975 or $1,000 is a very small amount for the owner to have to accept 9 or 10 years afterwards.

Mr. FOWLER. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota I can see the cattle might have been damaged in having the stigma placed upon them of being diseased cattle. But I can not understand——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, regular order. These lawyers when they get to talking are worse than women; they talk all day.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment; the gentleman can not further reserve the right to object under the demand for the regular order. That is what we have been proceeding under for about half an hour.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ELWIN CARLTON TAYLOR.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7194) for the relief of Acting Asst. Surg. Elwin Carlton Taylor, United States Navy.

The bill and amendments were read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, is there anything I could say to the gentleman from Illinois that would induce him to change his mind?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the right to object, although I shall object in the end.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will object in the end, that will dispose of it; but the restoration of this young man to the Navy has been asked for. This bill and the next one, introduced by Speaker CLARK, asks for restoration to the service.
